Rose Marie

Lovely Singing Star

When that honey-haired gal named Rose Marie opens her pretty mouth, it's often to sing behind a mike at some smooth dancing spot—knocking the customers in the aisles with that famous “tear” in her voice. This time—Rose Marie gives with a few pearls about Appeal. Devour it, if you would be teen-aged and terrific!

Says she, “There’s one thing you’re better at than anybody else. So play it up. That thing is being yourself. But being yourself at your best. How to do? You’ve got to be in top form—in short, to look hep, you’ve got to feel hep.

“Go in for sports. My favorites are swimming and horseback. And don’t try to cheat the Sandman! You owe him eight hours every night. Important with a capital ‘I’ is eating right. Three good meals a day—regular. Yes, breakfast included.

“Me, I take Wheaties with my breakfast. Wheaties have been a daily must in my family for years. They’re light, but they’re filling—and good! Those crisp, malt-sweet, golden-brown flakes of whole wheat are fun to eat. Good for you, too.”

Won’t you try Wheaties? Include a big bowlful of milk, fruit and Wheaties in your breakfast starting tomorrow.

MANHATTAN MYSTERY

Only a little package entrusted to Jenny
by a sweet old lady—and it held more dynamite than a bomb

By ADAM ALLEN

Author of "New Broome Experiment"

SEVERAL people got on the train with her, and by the time Jenny Whitman had moved down the aisle and found a seat beside a placid-looking, white-haired old lady, the crowded, rumbling cars were already moving again and there was no chance to wave out the window to Aunt Dora.

Jenny was almost glad. She had found it difficult to be properly affectionate toward her solicitous relative ever since Aunt Dora had stated firmly, that morning, that Jenny must not move out of Grand Central Station once she had set foot in it.

"Your train gets in at the Pennsylvania Station, of course," Aunt Dora had said, "and if you look around carefully you'll see signs pointing to the taxi stand. I want you to take a taxi, Jenny—I'll give you extra money for it—and tell the driver to take you to Grand Central. And when you get there, you must sit down in the waiting room and simply stay there until the train for Duxberry is ready to leave. I know five hours sounds like a long time, and it's too bad the schedule works out that way. But you buy some magazines, and get something to eat in the station restaurant, and the time'll be gone before you know it."

"And so will New York," Jenny had pointed out unhappily. "Aunt Dora, don't you understand? I've never been there before. Couldn't I look around just a little? If I walked out of the station in just one direction, and stayed right on that same street and then turned around after a while and came back—how could I get lost if I did that? I wanted to see Radio City at least."

"You couldn't see Radio City that way. Now, Jenny," Aunt Dora sounded impatient, "your mother's not well and I want to be able to assure her she needn't worry about you. We're all making sacrifices for her sake, aren't we? I've closed up my home in order to nurse her, and . . ."

"I know, Aunt Dora, and it's swell of you, but . . ."

"And you're giving up your friends and your own school for a term to lighten my burden. You're being very good about that, dear. So it's silly to make such a fuss about a few hours in New York, isn't it? Gracious—you'll get there again. You're young yet."

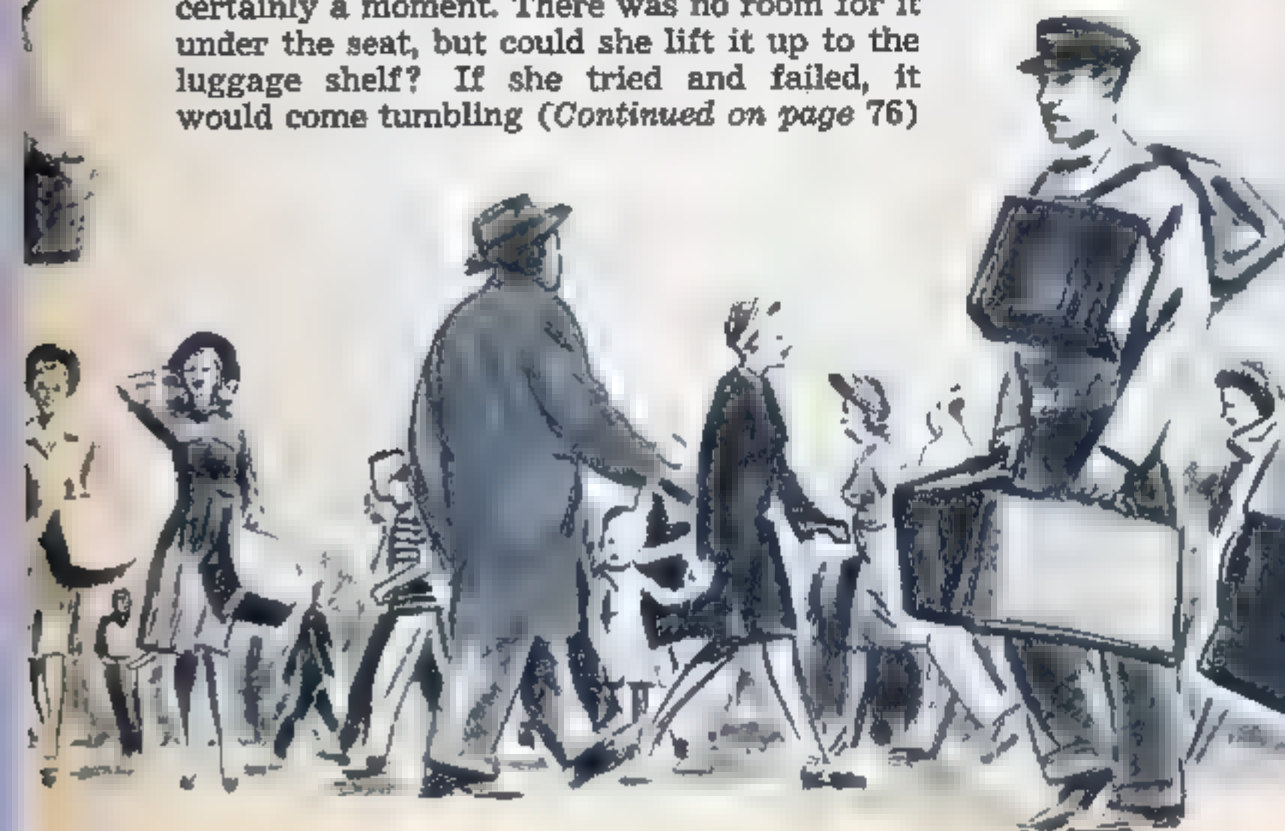

"Yes, Aunt Dora," Jenny murmured. But that was just the trouble, she thought. She was young—and Aunt Dora didn't seem to understand young people.

"And of course you won't speak to any strange men," Aunt Dora had concluded briskly.

Folding up her coat carefully now, before she sat down on the green plush seat, Jenny couldn't help one last little rush of resentment about it all. Of course she didn't want her mother to worry. But this day, that could have been so exciting, was just going to be one long stretch of sitting instead. And at the end of it would be Grandma and a new school and a bunch of strange kids she probably wouldn't like.

"I wish I'd at least found a seat next to somebody who looked interesting," she thought to herself. Just then the little old lady next to the window looked up at her and smiled, and Jenny's brown eyes smiled back at her remorsefully. After all, people couldn't help it if they didn't look at all interesting, she reminded herself sternly.

She lifted her big bag out of the aisle and stood uncertainly a moment. There was no room for it under the seat, but could she lift it up to the luggage shelf? If she tried and failed, it would come tumbling (Continued on page 76)

Suddenly Jenny Whitman—who had never felt real fear in her whole life—was terrified.

WHETHER you're Madam President or only the Newest, Shyest Member; your club means a lot to you—if it's the right kind of club. It means fun, and good friends, and plenty of peppy meetings where things—even such important things as war work—get done with a flourish.

And what makes the right kind of club? Well, live-wire members are a must, of course. And it's pretty important to have officers who know how to make a meeting hum with interest, who, even in a small organization, know their parliamentary procedure (perish the phrase!), and have but a single thought when it comes to their club—to make it the best ever!

Girls' clubs don't have much trouble finding candidates to run for office. Everyone wants to be elected. Sometimes, though, the new officers are in for surprises because they have so little idea of what is expected of them. And you know that perennial campaign speech, "If I am elected, I promise to fulfil the duties of the office . . ."

It's a fine thing to be president; dictatorship, and we want democracy in our clubs as well as in our country. That means seeing that every member has a place in the club which she can fill well and where she feels she counts for something. Takes quite a bit of thought, and the knack of seeing hidden gold even where there's little glitter. You'd be amazed at how often some quiet girl will prove to have poise and real ability when she's given a chance to use it.

Committee work is a good way to try out any member. An up-and-coming president will delegate plenty of work to committees. That isn't laziness, it's being a good executive and giving the members a chance to show what they can do. One of the important committees is Publicity. Maybe there won't be a club paper or a mimeographed sheet reporting club doings. Such things cost money. But the publicity committee may be (Continued on page 58) chances are the girl who's elected has already sat through quite a few business meetings and knows pretty much what happens when. But even a member of several years' standing may be surprised at how much know-how it takes to do a job.

For one thing, she needs to know the girls in the group and to consider their feelings before her own. Appointing her best friends to head all the important committees may get things done faster, but if that leaves the forgotten girls with long faces, what has she gained? Besides, that would be

Night Date in NEW YORK..

By NANCY PEPPER

Fashion Editor

YOU'D have to be week-ending in New York to see a movie at the famous Radio City Music Hall, or to dance to Woody Herman's music at the Hotel Pennsylvania, but you can stay right on Main Street and still wear these very same date fashions. If you don't find them at the nearest Official Headquarters Stores (see list on page 82), write for where-to-buy information.

Above—Gypsy colors in crepe date dresses for teen-age Doris Parsons and Marley Marseilles at the Pennsylvania Hotel's Cafe Rouge in New York. Woody Herman enthusiastically toots his approval of their smooth, sophisticated, and solid Seventeen Junior Teen frocks, about $15 each. Our girls get autograph of singer, Frances Wayne, too!

Below, left—Black sheer with pink lace is Eileen Howley's choice for date-dancing. A Susan Allyn, about $15. Betmar half hat. The boy is Eileen's own Big Deal, and his reaction's a hearty "Hubba!" They stop jiving to "Caledonia" long enough to get Woody Herman's autograph.

Opposite page—Janet Regan wears a turtle neck, wing shouldered rayon crepe dress, and she has the perfect costume for a visit to Radio City Music Hall on the arm of her favorite Air Corps Lieutenant. Universi-teen's "CALLING ALL GIRLS Dater," actually under $3. Sizes 7 to 15, in coral, grey, gold, aqua. Ermine and velvet hair band by Shirley Lipton.

COMING to the meeting after school, Redhead?" asked Peter, as he joined her on the corner. Sally Mason nodded happily. It was swell to be strolling along the street again with Peter, to have him calling her Redhead, the way he used to. Her hair was brown; it was her temper that had given her the nickname—and lots of other names besides. Redhead was by far the nicest one. It was her temper that had driven Peter away. For a while—a terribly long while, it seemed—she had been afraid that she'd really gone too far, that he wouldn't come back. And she couldn't have borne that.

But here he was. Talking the way he always had, asking questions, looking down at her, from his lean height, with sparkling blue eyes. At first he'd been a little stiff, and so had she. She didn't know how much he remembered of that awful scene. But when he said nothing about it, she knew he didn't want to remember—just as she didn't. It made her hot and cold all over. Maybe, after all, they could get back on the old footing.

"There's a lot to be done," Peter was saying. He took her arm and pulled her back. "Hi, want to walk right through a red light?"

She laughed. "I was thinking."

"Dangerous business. But seriously, you'd better start thinking about that meeting. You know why I called it, don't you?"

"Yes," she said. "Something's got to be done. But oh, Peter, I don't see what we can do."

"Don't give up the ship before we get out of the bay," he advised.

"Why, I wasn't!" She turned to face him. "What a silly thing to say!"

"It wathn't ath thilly ath it thounds," he grinned at her. "Everybody . . ."

But the color rode high in her face. She stopped and stamped her foot.

"Don't you dare mock me, Peter Harwood!" she stormed.

His eyes darkened. "Easy, there!"

"I'm sick and tired of your making fun of me!"

"It's a fascinating lisp," he drawled. "It sort of gets me."

She never lisped except when she was angry or excited and he knew it. He was making fun of her, teasing her. She hated it!

Something perverse and hurt inside her made her say, "I don't lisp . . ." and it came out "lithp." Furiously she threw her books on the ground. "You can just apologize yourself. It's fine you grew up."

He let her books lie. "It's time you did," he returned. "And the sooner the quicker." She was horrified to see him walking away, and with a determined set to his shoulders. She waited. But he did not turn.

She couldn't believe it. It had happened again. And what was it all about? Oh, darn her old temper, darn it, darn it! It was always getting her into trouble. Everything seemed to be going along all right, then some little thing happened—like this—and she could feel the blood rushing up to her head, and before she knew it, words came tumbling out—and she'd had another quarrel with somebody. Somebody like Peter.

Through a blur of tears she stared down at her books lying on the grass. I won't cry, I won't! she said fiercely to herself. But she knew Peter wouldn't come back this time. It was once too often. She felt as if she had a bag of stones in her chest. I could kick myself, she thought gloomily, picking up the scattered books. But would it do any good?

Probably not. She'd had a quick temper for as long as she could remember. People didn't like it, she knew, but somehow she couldn't stop. She'd tried, oh she had tried! But it came like a flash, always, and often she was surprised at herself. She couldn't know that she had lashed out, hurt somebody's feelings, upset the applecart, until it was all over. And then, of course, what could she do? She wasn't going to go around all the time saying, "I'm sorry." If people couldn't make allowances for her, they'd have to leave her alone.

She walked wearily up the school steps. Lately, though, it seemed as if more and more of the people she really cared about were leaving her alone. Amy had got huffy, and didn't ask her over any more; Catherine went around with her nose in the air; Doris had left her out of the round robin dance; and now Peter . . . She could hardly lift one foot in front of the other. And now Peter! That hurt. Peter counted more than any

SWEET VICTORY

Sally showed the class and the School Board president. She also learned a thing or two herself of the others, more than she'd ever realized.

At first she thought she wouldn't go to the meeting. But everybody would be there; they'd think it queer if she stayed away. And it was important. They had a real grievance this time. Peter had called the meeting—Peter was president of the class—to hash things over. They had to find a way out and do something about it. Though for the life of her she didn't see what they could do.

Furiously, Sally threw her books on the ground. "You can just apologize for yourself, Peter Harwood!" she stormed.

Peter had a group around him in hectic discussion. When she came in they glanced at her sharply, and Doris Matthews giggled. But Peter said something and they put their heads even closer together. Talking about her, were they? That did it.

Shortly afterward, Peter called the meeting to order. There was excitement in the air, but Peter managed to keep things under control.

"The Board of Education," he said, "has turned thumbs down on our proposal to start a Teen Club. It's really Mr. Leveridge, of course. He thinks it's nonsense, that there's no need for it here. We know there is. But we're up against a stone wall until we can convince him. The whole point of this meeting is, how are we going to do it?"

That set off a whirlpool of talk. The place seethed with it. Finally George Jenkins stood up.

"Why don't we forget it, then?" he asked in his lazy voice. "We've got enough to buck these days without bucking the stone wall, too. I guess we can get along."

Sally sprang to her feet. "That's ridiculous!" she cried. "We haven't even tried to get what we want—and need! Let's do something."

"Such as what?" Doris Matthews asked with a funny grin.

"Such as going to see Mr.

Leveridge and telling him straight what we're after and why." She heard the words after she had said them, and was aghast. Suddenly, she knew what was coming.

"Okay, let's put Sally on the job. She's yearning for trouble, and she's got enough temper to serve for a whole committee."

George made the suggestion just a little too patly, a little too quickly. She saw now what it was—a put-up job. That's what they had been talking about in the corner when she came in. They had decided that if she so much as opened her mouth, they'd give her the dirty work.

They thought they had her on the spot. Color flared in her cheeks, and her eyes shot sparks. She stood up, facing them.

"All right, I'll do it for the rest of you—sissies. Maybe you won't think it's so funny next week."

With that she sailed out of the room. There was an electric silence, and she had the brief satisfaction of knowing that her acceptance had stupefied them. It was Peter's doing. He wanted to take her down a couple of pegs. He was getting even for her display of temper toward him this morning. It was small, it was mean of him! She had never been so angry in her life.

"What's Mr. Leveridge like, Daddy?" she asked that night as they sat down to dinner.

She'd had time to think about what lay ahead of her, and she was pale with trepidation. She'd bitten off more than she could chew, and would the gang laugh when she choked on the wad they'd given her!

"Leveridge? Oh, he's short and wears glasses and has a red face . . ."

"I don't mean that way," Sally explained. "I mean—really."

"Peppery old duck. Has a temper like a shotgun. Goes off if you look sideways at him." He gave her a quick, amused glance. "Somewhat like you. Why the interest in Leveridge?"

"He's head of the School Board," Sally said, above the lump in her throat. "And I'm going to see him."

Her father looked dazed. "Is that your idea of fun?"

"No," Sally said with a little more spirit, "it's the gang's."

And that was all she would tell him. Much as she would have liked to confide in someone, to feel her father's support and sympathy, she was afraid that if she began talking about it, she'd break down and give up. She had to go through with it.

And she did. Mr. Leveridge sat behind a massive walnut desk that almost dwarfed him. He was just as Daddy had said, she noted with interest—short, red-faced, eyeglasses.

"Sit down, young lady," he boomed. He did not rise, and scarcely glanced at her. "You're wasting your time, I can tell you right now."

"Do you know what I've come for?" Sally asked.

"Generally speaking, yes. Some selfish plan of a particular little group. I don't know which group you represent, but all groups are alike—their own interests before anyone else's, and the devil take the hindmost."

Sally felt her temper rising—she knew the telltale signs—her nostrils flaring, the quick indrawn breath, a rush of words clamoring to be said. She pressed her lips together to keep the angry words from pouring out.

"That's not very fair of you, Mr. Leveridge," she managed at last, "to condemn us before we speak."

"Oh, it's not, isn't it?" he said belligerently. "Well, what's your particular gripe?"

He had no right to talk to her like that! She wanted to lash out, stinging. A red mist was rising in front of her eyes.

"I'm not griping," she returned. Her jaw muscles ached with the effort she was making. "I represent the Juniors at Meadville High. And we're planning a Teen Club. We need your consent."

"Then you can take yourself off at once," he retorted. "Because I've already said I wouldn't give it."

"Are you the whole Board of Education?" That was daring. (Continued on page 61)

It's perfectly NATURAL

A frank discussion of a physical process of growing up by a well-known doctor who understands girls

By RUTH BRICKNER, M.D.

If you were different from every other girl in the world, you wouldn't like it, would you? So when you begin to menstruate, at least that worry's off your mind. But then a lot of others take its place. Did you start too early—or too late? Do you flow too much or too little? Maybe you oughtn't to skate or swim or play tennis at such times—or wash your hair, or bathe? My goodness, maybe you oughtn't even to take the stairs two at a time! And what's it all about anyway?

Well, it's a very essential part of growing up, this menstruation business. And because it's important, and natural, there's no reason at all for shrouding it in a lot of mystery. Oh, we used to be hush-hush about it, and to believe the monthly menstrual period was a time when we couldn't work or play or enjoy life with as much freedom as at other times. Now, although, of course you don't run around talking indiscriminately about it, for it is an intimate bodily function, you lucky girls live in an age when such matters as menstruation are discussed quite frankly, with real understanding, and where you can get the right answers to the questions that bother you.

Most of you know menstruation as that time of the month when there is a slight flow of blood coming from the vaginal opening, and lasting about five days. Maybe you call it "having your period," or "being regular." But you've heard other terms for it, some of them pretty crude and inappropriate, like "the curse," or "falling off," or even "Grandma." Some women call it their "sick time," or "being unwell," partly from a habit of shying away from such words as "menstruate," and partly because when they were growing up, they didn't have the advantage of our present knowledge about this perfectly natural function. Actually some of them weren't up to par at that time, or had discomforts they could have avoided, and a lot of them were full of fears and superstitions. Most of them were kept away from sports and other activities without good reason, and few girls in those days understood why they had their monthly (Continued on page 72)

MOVIES that

Selected by ELIZABETH NICHOLS, Movie Editor

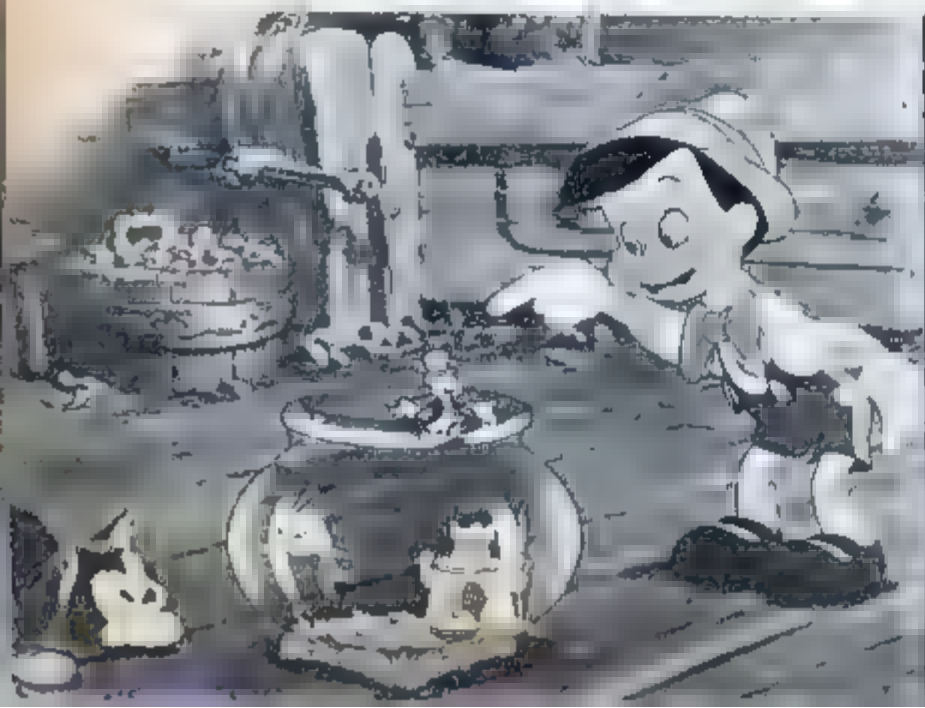

Above—June Allyson and Robert Walker do a dream dance in "Her Highness and the Bellboy." Alas, it is all a dream, for June isn't really the princess—Hedy Lamarr plays that part. So if she can only dream that the bellboy loves her, why not make it a bang-up dream, thinks June, and be a princess herself? (MGM)

Right—Suppose you had a couple of darling cousins named Margaret O'Brien and Jackie Jenkins who lived on neighboring farms? Suppose you visited them and had adventures galore—and met the handsome editor (James Craig)—and the pretty schoolteacher (Frances Gifford)? Lots of fun, huh? You can practically have all your best supposes by seeing "Our Vines Have Tender Grapes." (MGM)

Below—Walt Disney's "Pinocchio" is back! Like taking a beloved book off the shelf for re-reading on a rainy day, you can go again to see the little boy who had to learn the hard way not to tell lies—remember how his nose grew and grew? Pinocchio's friends are with him, too—the oh-so-coy fish in the bowl, the cat who meant plenty of harm, the kindly shoemaker, the accommodating whale in whose warm insides Pinocchio found refuge—and all the delightful rest. (RKO)

Below—Do you recall how at the end of "Going My Way" Bing Crosby as Father O'Malley moved on to another needy parish? Well, you can follow right along, for in "The Bells of St. Mary's" the young priest is hard at work rescuing a parochial school from financial difficulties, as well as winning the nuns over to more modern ideas of teaching. With Ingrid Bergman as one of the Sisters, and Joan Carol as a pupil with troubles of her own, the film is sincerely and beautifully acted. (RKO)

MATTER

Below—There's a new Western hero ridin' the range, gals, name of Allan Lane. And he's no drugstore cowboy, for he played football at Notre Dame. Twinkle Watts is his devoted admirer in "Trail of Kit Carson" even when he is in jail. The hero is always wrongfully jailed so he can break out—see? There is a heroine, too, but nobody minds her. (Rep.)

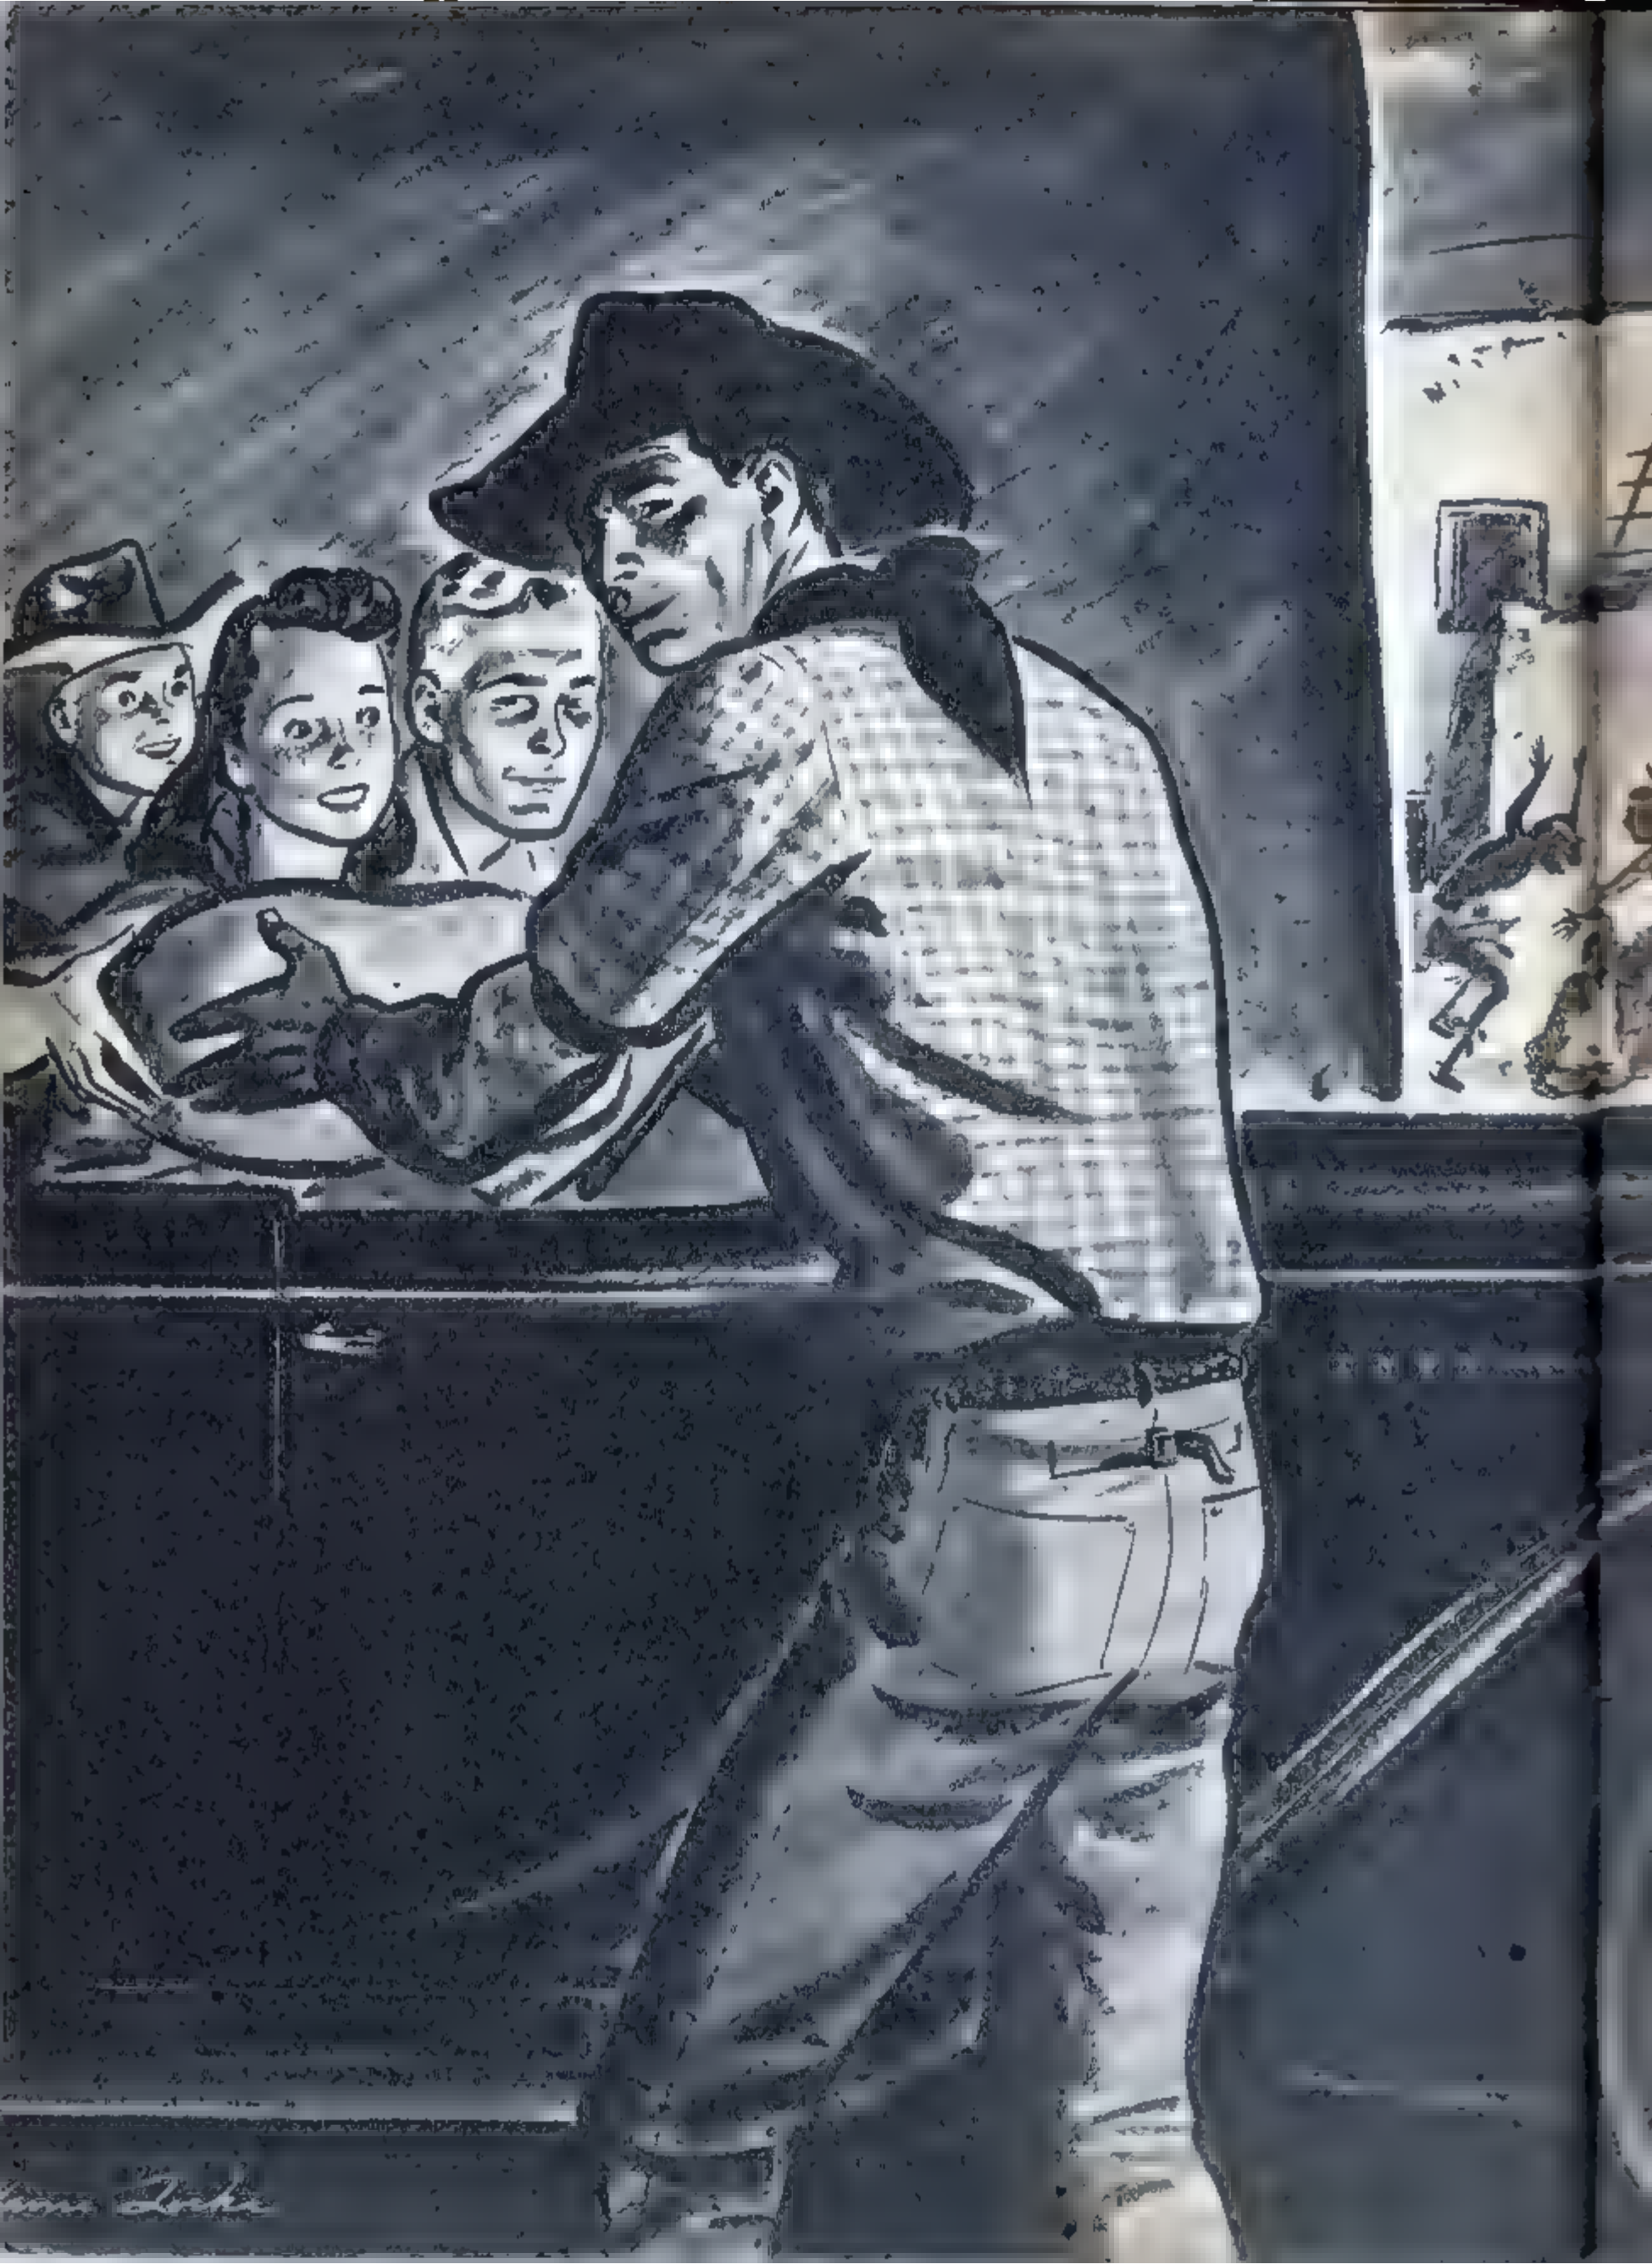

Above—If you have read and seen "Jane Eyre" and "Wuthering Heights" (and who hasn't?) you will want to know the amazingly gifted Brontë sisters who wrote them. "Devotion" tells of their turbulent lives in a sheltered parsonage, with Olivia De Havilland as Charlotte, Ida Lupino as Emily, Nancy Coleman as Anne, and Paul Henreid as the village curate Emily loves. (Warners)

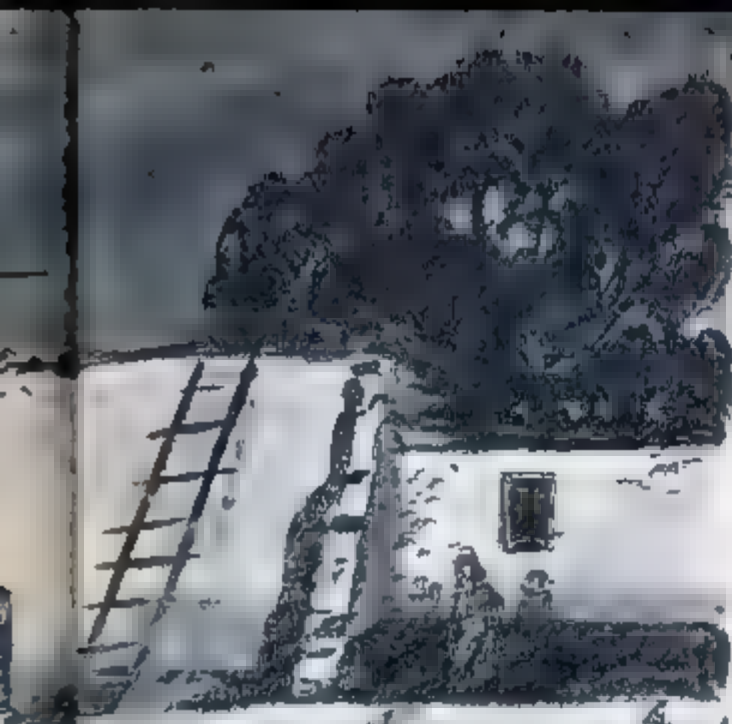

Right—Talk about the GI Bill of Rights! John Payne finishes his stint for Uncle Sam, comes back to Hollywood, and steps right into "The Dolly Sisters" as leading man to two stars, Betty Grable and June Haver. Betty and June are Jenny and Rosy Dolly, and they're almost identical. (20th-Fox)

Below, right—Long before they meet, Joseph Cotten has been writing love letters to Jennifer Jones for a pal of his. She falls in love with the letters and marries the other man. Later she is accused of having murdered him. Then Joseph comes back into her life to free her from the spell of ill fate she suffers in "The Love Letters." (Para.)

Mystery of the LOST VILLAGE

Rusty learned the Ark's secret, but it took a deep dark plot to end the mischief at the cave

By ANNETTE TURNER
Author of "Mystery Rides the River"

THE FINAL INSTALLMENT
REMEMBER, Rusty," Bob said, "how Nick complained about the back seat, how springless it was? This is why." From the box he carried, he produced what looked like old-fashioned cylinder phonograph records, a dozen or more, and ranged them on the table.

"Those were in the back cushion?" Rusty gasped. "What are they?"

"Dictaphone records," Bob said.

"And that's what you were after?" Toby asked.

Bob nodded. "I knew there must be some, because when I was down here with Dr. Fundy four years ago, he had a dictaphone and a box of empty cylinders in the cabin, and they used to disappear one at a time. I didn't know where he hid them. Didn't suspect the car until I learned you wanted it, Mrs. Fundy, and John wrote he'd overheard you tell Dr. Jerrold you thought it was best not to say anything to Cy until you could search the car. Then I decided I had to get it first."

"Why, Bob?" Mrs. Fundy asked quietly.

Bob smiled at her. "Tell me first why you wanted it."

"Very well. I knew Dr. Fundy was in the habit of keeping a diary on the dictaphone when he was on a trip. He'd transcribe it later when we got home again. Once before, in South America, he had some very important information and he hid his precious records under the floor of the car for safe-keeping. Only they didn't fare very well. I hoped he'd kept such a diary of his last expedition, but you didn't bring me any records when you returned from Arizona four years ago, and I was too upset then to think of such a thing. Now when Cy got me interested in digging again, I began to wonder about it. I decided since there weren't any records in the cabin, and the dictaphone was there, they must have been hidden in the car I'd sold. As to why I wanted them—well, if Cy's going to dig, I'd like him to dig in the right place. And though Cy's cave has been good practice and fun, I'm convinced it's not the site of an Indian village."

"I've found potsherds there," Cy said indignantly.

"Indians may have visited the cave," Mrs. Fundy said. "But they didn't live there."

Cy's ears turned red. "Fine thing!" he mumbled.

"And now, Bob," Mrs. Fundy said, "why did you want to find the records before I could get them?"

Bob's glance shifted uneasily. "I'm not sure I ought to tell, even now." He (Continued on page 64)

"You won't forget, will you?" Rusty said, as John Revere took the bundle and went off into the dark.

You must be personally dainty, fragrantly fresh, to pass the close-up test. Are you?

By LOUISE CARLISLE, Good Looks Editor

YOU may spend plenty of time in arranging your hair just so, you may wear the most flattering make-up, your clothes may be dreams of style and fit—but—how's the atmosphere around you? Beauty is not all in the eye of the beholder; his nose knows, too. And although you can look in the mirror and see whether your face is dirty, or your slip showing, you can't trust your own nose to judge whether you are truly dainty. Of course you aren't going to go around worrying about it all the time, but if you're a fastidious girl you'll take all the necessary care to safeguard your freshness in every way.

Sing a Song of Soapuds

It's perfectly normal to perspire, but there's an offensive odor about perspiration which mars your daintiness if it clings to the body or clothing. It's the soap and water treatment that removes perspiration and its traces, so for daintiness as well as cleanliness, we recommend: frequent warm baths, daily if possible; frequent shampoos; frequent tubbing of underclothing, sweaters, and blouses, washing of stockings and socks after each wearing.

Shoes and unwashable dresses should be aired often and don't forget your hats. Of course, garments that cannot be laundered should be dry cleaned as often as necessary. You can freshen the headbands of your hats yourself with a little cleaning fluid.

Fresh as the Dawn, All Day Long

But how to be sure that you stay as sweet as you are when you step from the bathtub and don your crisp, clean clothing? In the normal day's activities, even if you just sit in a warm classroom, but especially if you run and play games, you are bound to perspire more or less. The armpits are the worst offenders, because you perspire more freely there, and the odor clings more to the clothing under the arms because it gets less chance to air away. There are "non-perspirants"—liquid or cream preparations—which almost entirely check perspiration in the armpits. This is a harmless practice if you follow the manufacturer's directions, and of course prevents odor.

"Deodorants" do not check perspiration, but they neutralize the odor of it for a number of hours. Used daily, a good deodorant is very effective, and it may be used not only under the arms, but, if you wish, on the feet and on sanitary pads, too. (Of course some pads are already treated with such a preparation.)

Unless you check perspiration in the armpits, you will probably want to wear shields in your dresses and sweaters to (Continued on page 55)

BE NICE TO BE NEAR!

Let's Talk Things Over with ALICE BARR GRAYSON

Author of "Do You Know Your Daughter?"

I'm really quite mixed up. Would you help me? I usually go to my Mother and yet I feel I can't go to her now. When Daddy went away five years ago I was a child. Now he's back and I am a young woman. According to Mummy he thinks a lot of me. Nobody says he has changed, but he has towards me. He treats me like some sort of a new contraption that has no deeper feeling than to want money and gifts from here, there and the other place. Something that he should sit and watch and take a polite interest in, even though he is most bored. I have tried giving him the cold shoulder. I have tried being very loving. He's been home a month now and I am more unhappy each day. The fault may be mine. What shall I do, please?—Hope H., aged 14, Missouri.

SOME of the problems Hope shares with us are quite typical of those faced in many homes these days, and those which will be faced by increased numbers as more men and women in the armed forces come home for good. If there is anything in the world the returning veteran does not want, it is to be considered a problem—and he isn't one, either. He is likely to need time in making certain adjustments to civilian life, for that is only natural. But, in the deepest sense, he will come back much the same person, even though his experiences during the years away from home will have changed some things about him, just as these same years will have left their mark on those who remained behind. Time does not stand still for anyone. Hope herself has been growing up, and both her parents have grown older—by the same number of years.

What can Hope do? To begin with, she must remind herself that one month is a very short time. Patience is required. Both the returned veteran and his family share the responsibility for gradually re-establishing their relationship with one another. They must try to bridge the gap created by the years apart. They will want to share some of their separate experiences and to become acquainted with the somewhat older—and therefore somewhat different—people they have all become. They need one another's help, too, in recalling the past that was shared, filling in the missing links as best they can, and creating new common bonds. For instance, Hope might introduce her dad to some of her friends; she might ask him to visit her school; she might take him for walks around the town, pointing out the changes that have been made; she might tell him about her studies, her music, the books she has enjoyed, her ideas about a future career, about her mother's brave spirit during his absence. And she certainly will want to lend a listening

MANNERS...family style

It's your homework in good manners that helps you pass the charm test in public—and here's a word on the assignment

By MARTHA ROSS

YOU'VE probably heard a story something like the one Sorry Sue reported the other day. "Imagine my embarrassment," she said. "I went screaming into the living room to ask Mother something, and there sat our new neighbor and her dream-boy son having tea with Mother. Golly, Mother looked daggers, and that new boy scowled at me as if I were a termite. Jeepers, I didn't know Mother had company."

It was tough luck for Sorry Sue but we can't have too much sympathy for her. Of course, the way she felt about it was that if she had known there was company present, she would have donned her "company manners." However, if she made it a practice to be courteous and considerate all the time, she wouldn't have been caught short!

Too many people have the unfortunate habit of putting on good manners along with their dress-up clothes. If you stop to think about it, you'll easily see why that's such a bad idea. For one thing, manners in themselves are just a series of well-cultivated habits. So—if you have two sets of habits, one good and one sloppy, it takes a lot of concentration to remember not to slip into the wrong groove. Which means that when you're in the public eye, part of your mind must be occupied with the job of making sure that you stand up at the right times and say thank you at the right places, and only part of your mental powers are left free to join in the conversation. However, if your manners are of one pattern, and so well-groomed that they go on functioning properly without constant checking, then you can turn all your attention to being charming.

Another good reason for routine good manners is that they make for a happier home life. People tend to take their families rather for granted, and often don't bother to allow the home folks the common courtesies given to the rest of the world. And that is really silly—inasmuch as all of us have to spend a good deal of time at home with our families. A gracious and charming manner is a contagious thing. Practicing (Continued on page 69)

WAC IN SHANGRI-LA

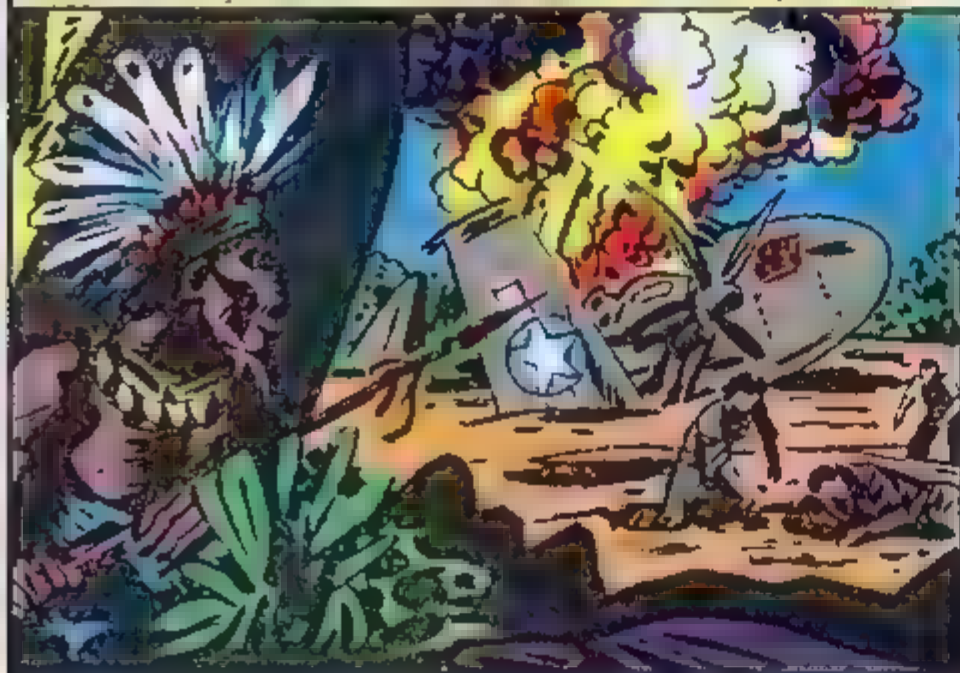

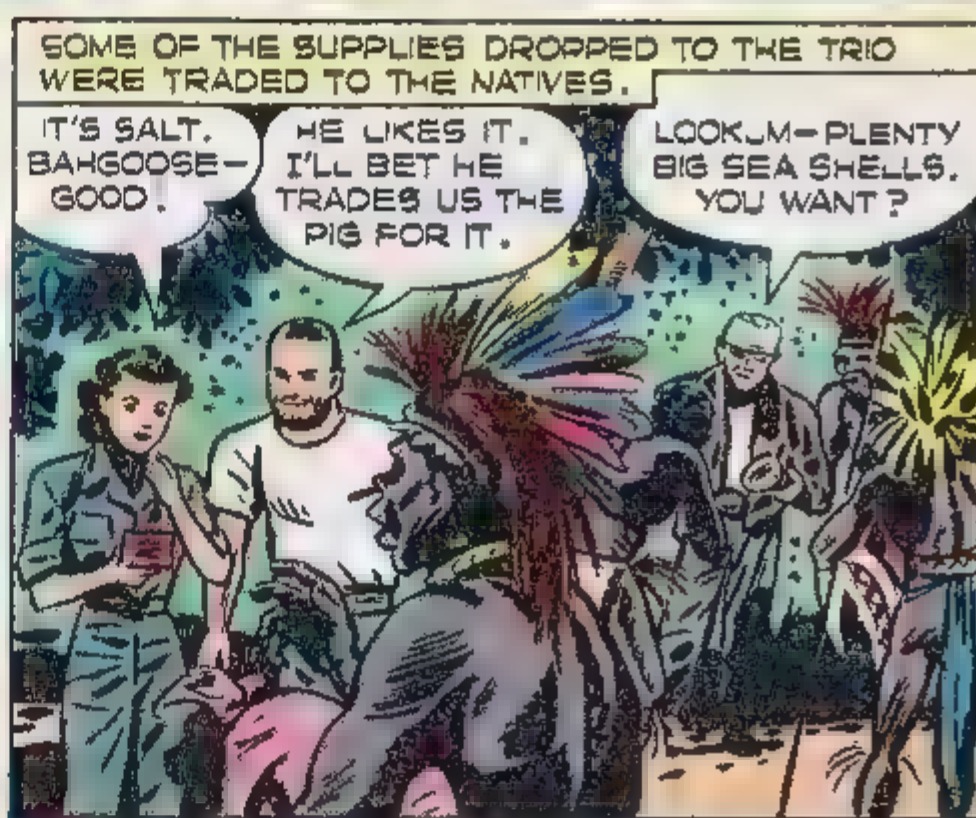

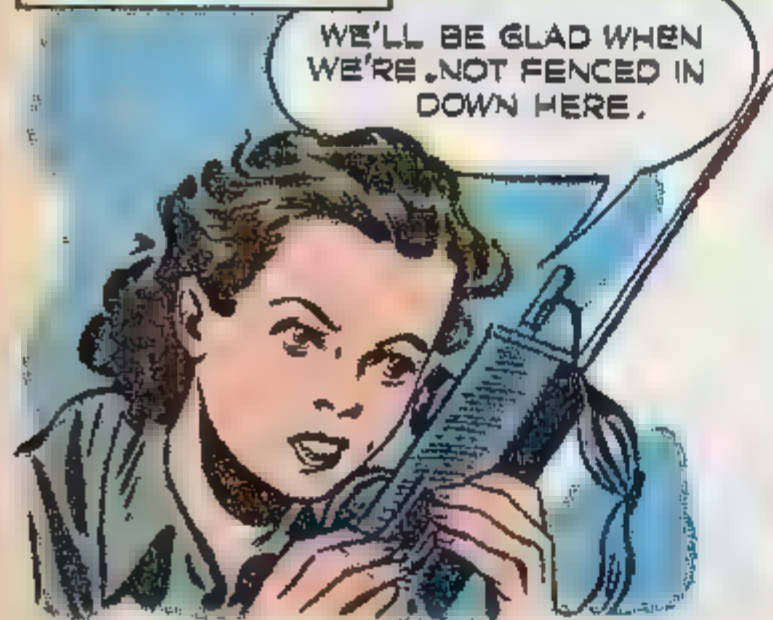

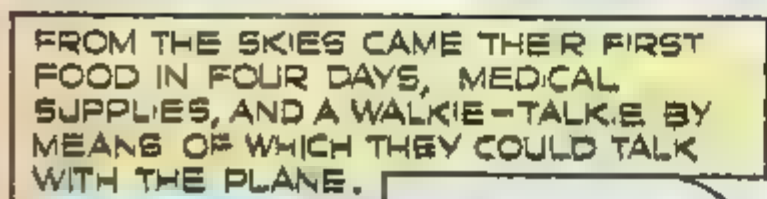

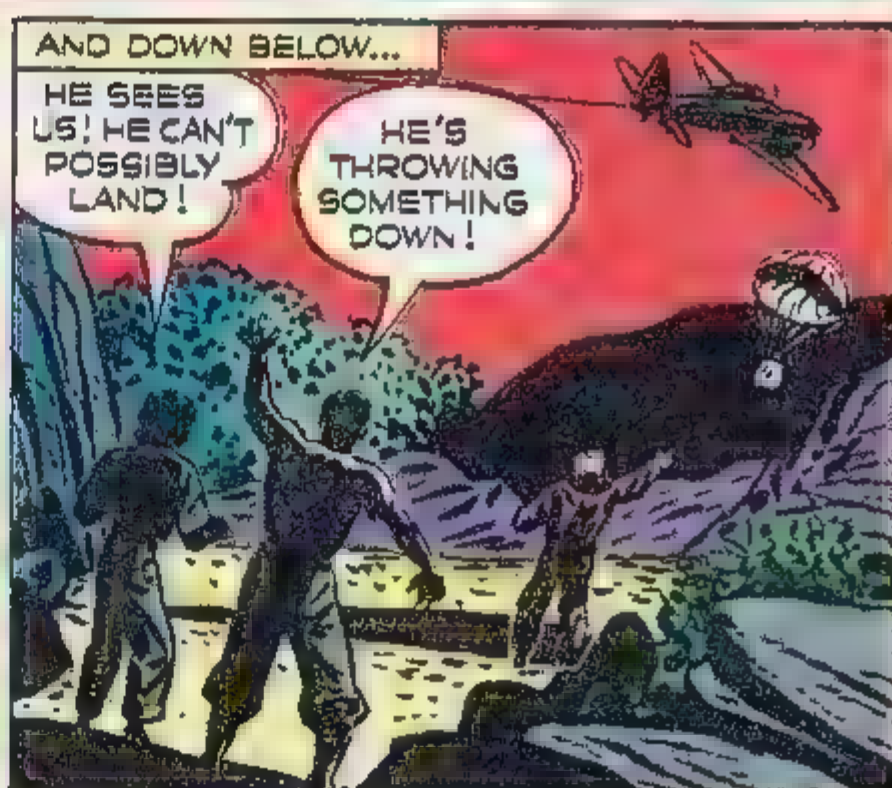

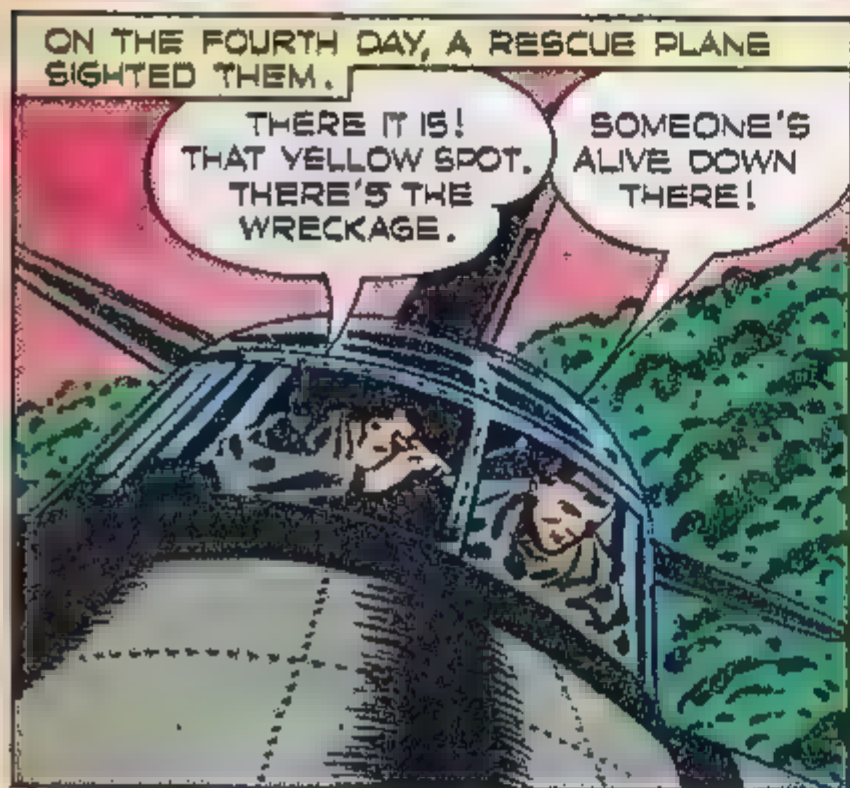

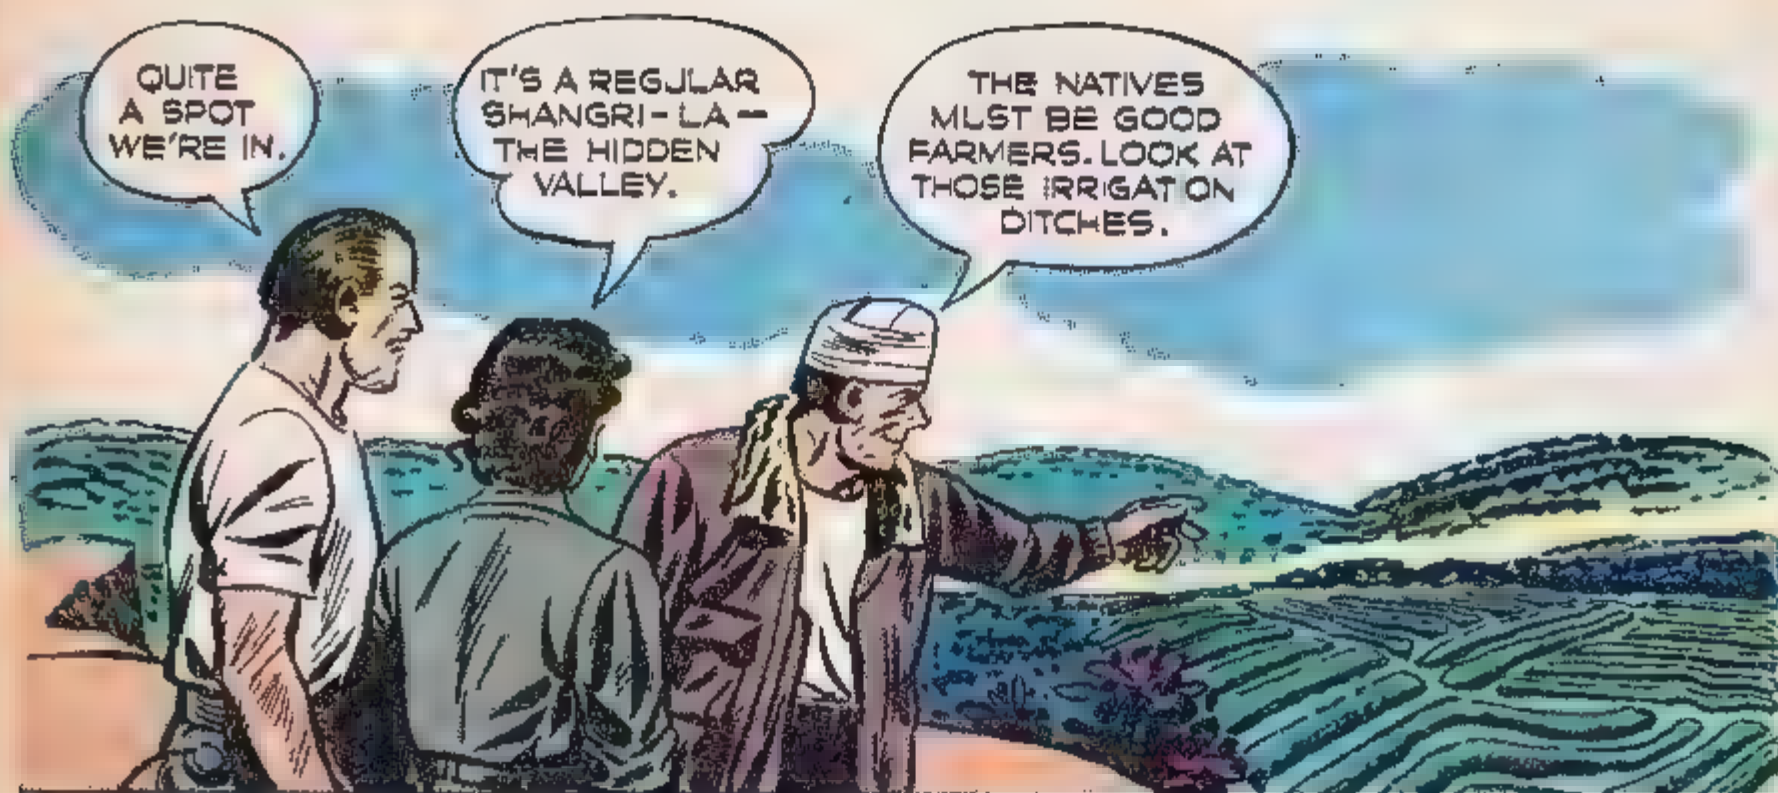

MAROOINED FOR WEEKS IN A NEW GUINEA VALLEY HIDDEN FROM THE WORLD, WAC CORPORAL MARGARET J. HASTINGS AND HER TWO COMPANIONS WERE RESCUED BY ONE OF THE MOST DARING A.R. FEATS EVER ATTEMPTED—A TRUE STORY

ON MAY 13, 1945, AN ARMY TRANSPORT PLANE WITH TWENTY-FOUR ABOARD CRASHED IN THE ORANJE MOUNTAINS IN DUTCH NEW GUINEA. THE THREE SURVIVORS WERE WAC CORPORAL MARGARET J. HASTINGS OF OWEGO, N.Y., LIEUTENANT JOHN MCCOLLUM OF TRENTON, MO., AND TECHNICAL SERGEANT KENNETH DECKER OF KELSO, WASH.

DD YOU FIND ANY FIRST-AID SUPPLIES LEUTENANT?

NO—ONLY THE LIFE RAFT. WE CAN PUNCTURE IT AND USE IT FOR A TENT.

MEANWHILE, BACK AT HOLLANDIA, THE ARMY WAS WORKING OUT A DARING RESCUE SCHEME.

WE CAN'T GET IN WITH A PLANE, BUT A GLIDER COULD BE TOWED INTO THE VALLEY...

AND WE'D FLY LOW AND PICK IT UP!

A CAPTAIN AND FILIPINO PARATROOPERS WERE DROPPED INTO THE VALLEY TO BUILD A GLIDER STRIP.

WHILE THE STRIP WAS BEING BUILT, THE THREE CEMENTED THEIR FRIENDSHIP WITH THE NATIVES, WHO WANTED TO MAKE MARGARET QUEEN.

FROM NOW ON, YOU TWO COULD ADDRESS ME AS "YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS"!

YOU'RE JUST A CORPORAL TO ME, HASTINGS.

A WARLIKE NEIGHBORING TRIBE ATTACKED THE FRIENDLY NATIVES OF SHANGRI-LA.

BOY, THIS IS ONE WAR I DON'T WANT TO FIGHT!

STILL WANT TO BE QUEEN, QUEEN?

I'LL ABDICATE RIGHT NOW!

FINALLY THE STRIP WAS FINISHED AND THE GLIDER CAME IN.

THE CABLE WAS SUSPENDED...

YOU FIRST, CLEEN.

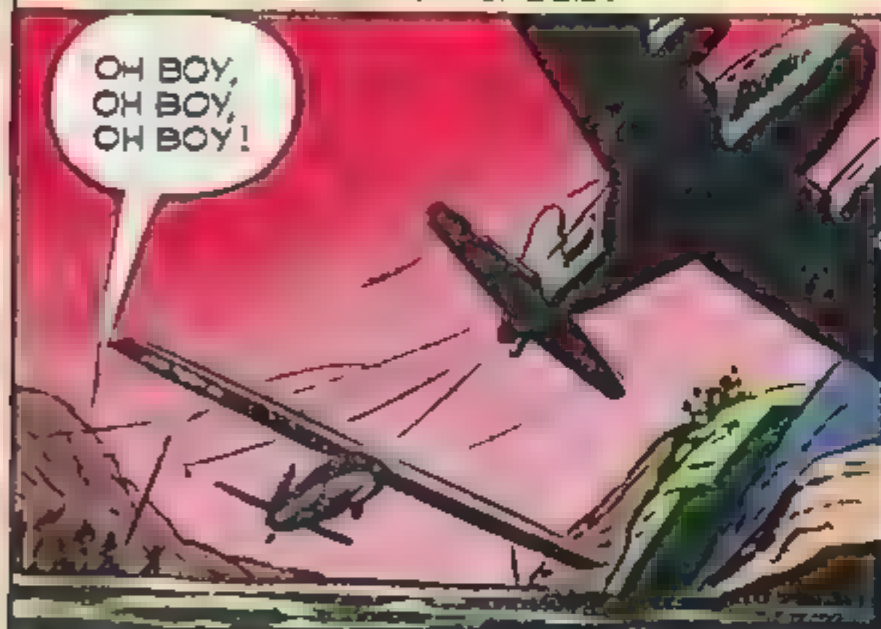

WHAT ABOUT ALL THESE PARATROOPERS?

DON'T WORRY ABOUT US. WE'LL GET OUT TODAY OR TOMORROW.

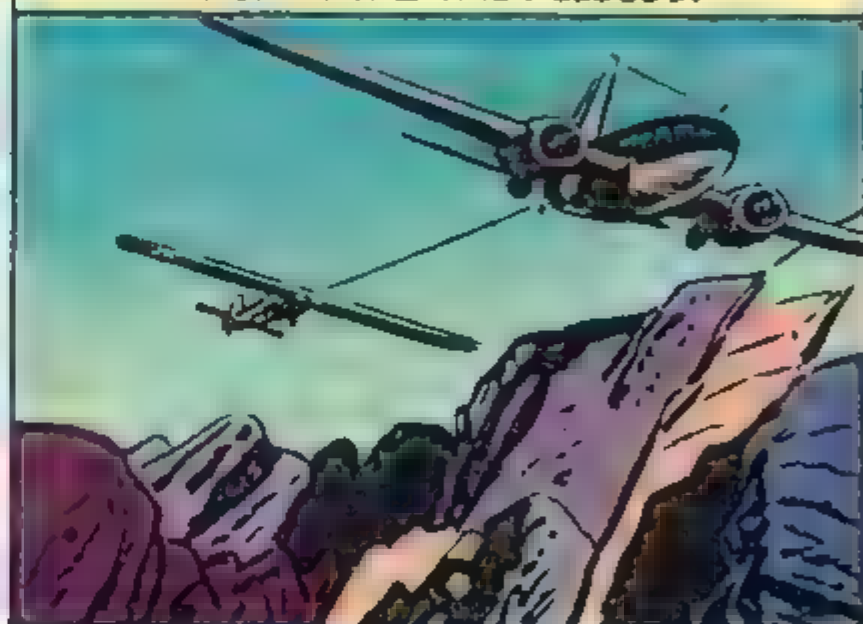

THE C-47 SWOOPED WITHIN TWENTY FEET OF THE VALLEY FLOOR, AND THE HOOK CAUGHT ON THE TOW CABLE.

OH BOY, OH BOY, OH BOY!

THEN FOLLOWED THE FIGHT FOR ALTITUDE TO CLEAR THE 10,000-FOOT MOUNTAINS, AND TO DODGE THE THICK CLOUDS.

AND SOON, CORPORAL HASTINGS AND HER COMPANIONS WERE SAFE AT THE HOLLANDIA AIR BASE.

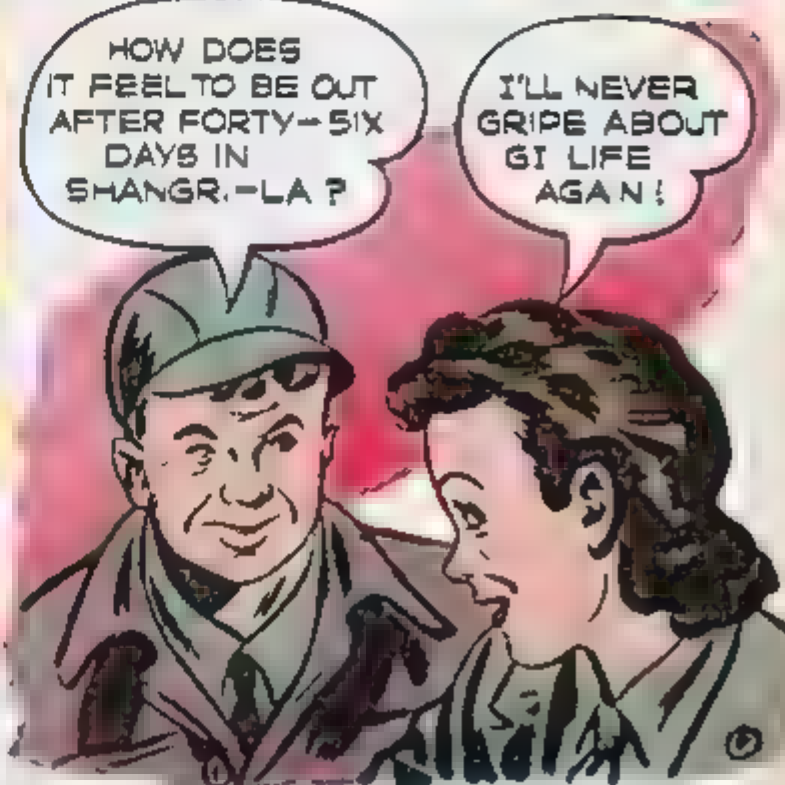

WHY THE AMBULANCES? WE'RE IN FINE SHAPE.

BAHGOOSE, LEUTENANT! WE'RE SURE OKAY NOW!

HOW DOES IT FEEL TO BE OUT AFTER FORTY-SIX DAYS IN SHANGRI-LA?

I'LL NEVER GRIPE ABOUT GI LIFE AGAIN!

Four Little Pitfalls... and how to lick 'em

1. When you're getting ready for Bed...

DO YOU give your sleepy face a lick—and the promise of a thorough workout when you're not so tired?

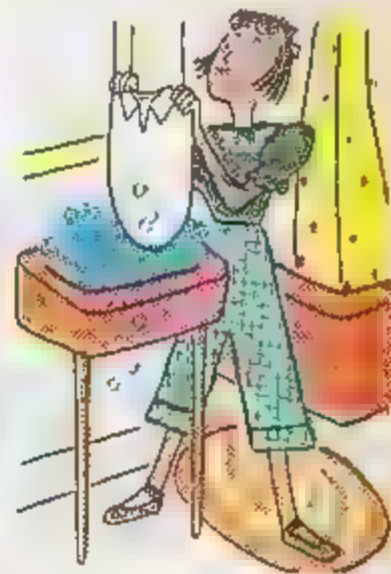

OR whisk off dirt 'n dust with Swan's dreamy-mild lather? Regular Swanning, you know, helps you stay angel-faced! This grand floatie's pure as fine castles!

2. When your white dickey is slightly gray...

DO YOU tuck it slyly into your drawer, thinking, "I'll wear it just once more"?

OR tub it pronto in Swan's duds-loving suds? Baby-mild Swan freshens up tired frills but fast—keeps you looking like a starched daisy!

3. When it's your first date with that new swoon-swoon...

DO YOU work yourself into such a tizzy trying on every rag in the closet, that you "haven't time" for even a shower?

OR do you first relax in the whipped-cream magic of Swan's beauty bath? And dreamily plan your wardrobe strategy while mild Swan gets you sparkling-clean as a movie queen!

4. When mother says you can't go till you've done the dishes.

DO YOU spend 20 minutes arguing... and 10 minutes waiting over your lily-white hands?

OR polish off the dishes in jig time with gentle, floating Swan? A smoothie for pretty hands, a busy sudser—Swan really helps chase dishwashing-doldrums!

By NANCY PEPPER, Fashion Editor

AS if the "op" language didn't complicate things enough, there's a new tidal wave of "Stoopnagle-itis" (after the Colonel of the same name) sweeping over the teens. It's a case of reversing the letters and sometimes the syllables of words. For instance, you'd call me Pancy Nepper. Instead of "Where are you going?" you'd say, "Care are you whoaing?" That's you, that's you—always doing things the hard way; always talking English as it is Broken!

DATE DATA

JIVE BOMBER—Good Dancer.

THE FEET—What you call a boy who is ditto. (Well, don't you call Frank the "Voice," and Dick the "Throat?")

BORESOME FOURSOME—Double date for Gruesome Twosome.

CRASH DIVE—Super Date.

BOMBING MISSION—Extra Big Deal.

BIG THREE CONFERENCE—When a girl has a date with two boys (black marketing again, we know!)

IS THIS DRIP NECESSARY?—What you feel like saying when your Blind Date turns out a sight for sore eyes.

HAG STAG—Harpy Huddle, or Hen Party (Somethin's missing. Guess what?)

OVEN—The phonograph, on account of that's where you put the Hot Platters. See?

PALATE PLUSH—What he treats you to at the Marble Slab after the Movies.

CANDY—Sweet and smooth (from the song of the same name.)

HI, MATE, HOW DO YOU RATE?

THE new name for a Smooth Boy is "V.J." or "Vansome" (after you know whom) and the way to describe a Jerky Jackson is "Hardly Hodiak." But, how about YOU? Does the Wolf Pack howl "Hubba, Hubba" when you pass, or do they just howl? How many of these Daffynitions apply to you?

*JABBERWOCKY is Jive Talk—the happy, wacky doubletalk that belongs to the slick chick and solid jackson, from coast to coast.

PIRD—That's "Drip" spelled backwards, as almost everything is these days. Or, how about KREI? (You work that one out.)

BACALLISH—A very potent pigeon.

COSMIC—Wonderful, out of this world. It's taking the place of "cataclysmic."

INSIDE DOPE—A drip who doesn't get around much any more.

CLICK CHICK—A popular Slick Chick. S.L.A.—Short, Light, Adorable (And we hope you find yours T. D. & H.)

MALE MISER—Girl who hoards dates.

TRICKLE—Used as a noun it's just another word for "Drip."

DROP IN THE BUCKET—Another synonym for drip.

Aren't we Sharp as a Drill, and Twice as Boring?

INSULTS WITH A SMILE

OR, Compliments in Reverse. You've heard these gags banded about around the Corner Casbah. They're said with a smile, and when you learn how to bounce 'em back, you'll know you're one of the gang.

"Hi, look who's here, if you can stand it!"

"Feed it—maybe it'll go away."

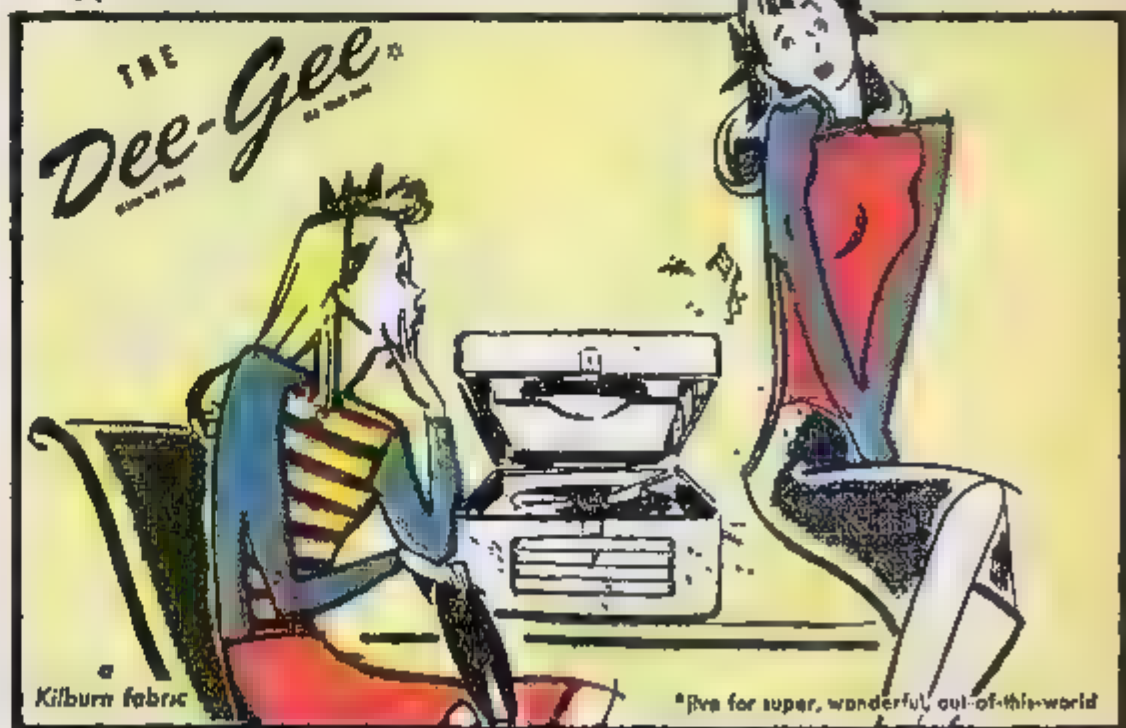

"Pull an envelope over your head and mail it to the Dead Letter Office."

"You have dancing eyes. They're both over at your nose, sitting this one out."

MAKE your alterations with a pair of knitting needles, and you'll have those last year's discards looking like this year's treasures. For instance, fourteen-year-old Ann Francis was upset about her outgrown plaid jacket, until we showed her how to knit in a pair of sleeves and crochet link buttons. For this, and other First Aid knitting tricks, send stamped, self-addressed, large-size envelope for free Knit to Fit leaflets to Fashions, CALLING ALL GIRLS, 52 Vanderbilt Ave., New York 17, N. Y.

KNIT to FIT!

Top sketch—Sleeves in that wool dress worn out, or no longer in style? Knit a pair of contrasting sleeves for a brand-new deep armhole effect.

Center sketch—Knitted midriff expands a short-waisted, short-skirted dress. Knit cuffs to match.

Sketch at right—Knit a complete yoke with sleeves, sew it to any old dress for an outfit that's strictly 1945. The Knit to Fit leaflet will tell you how!

protect them from staining, as well as to prevent their accumulating that unpleasant odor which is hard to remove even with cleaning fluids. Shields should be washed frequently, or the cure will be worse than the disease!

Freshness and fragrance go hand in hand, but perfume will not in itself keep you fresh. Soap and water must come first. In perfumes, we prefer true flower scents or light, "crisp" scents. Heavy, exotic odors are as much out of place for teeners as backless evening dresses and dangling earrings. A delicate fragrance will cling to your skin if you use scented soap in your bath, and for extra luxury you may follow it with a splash of cologne or a dusting of bath powder. A dash of toilet water in the final rinse when you wash your hair and your hairbrush gives a glamorous touch.

It's nice to carry around just a faint suggestion of fragrance discernible to those who are nearest to you, but a noticeable odor of perfume in the classroom is not only inappropriate but almost as objectionable as perspiration odor. So reserve your use of perfume extract for dates, and use it sparingly on your skin or hair, never on fabric. A subtle whiff of fragrance is far more pleasing than an inescapable aroma of even the most exotic and expensive essence.

Your clothes can take on a delightful fragrance, too, if you do a few tricks like these: Perfume your undies and sweaters by tucking sachets among them in the bureau drawers. (You can buy them or you can make them by sprinkling sachet powder on bits of cotton and encasing them in tiny bags of ribbon or pretty material—any scraps will do.) Or keep cakes of your favorite scented soap in the bureau drawers. Dresses and things kept in closets will take on sweetness if you attach sachets to your clothes hangers. Try slipping a sachet inside the lining of your best hat for heady fragrance.

Fresh manners may cost a girl her popularity, but freshness about her person is sure to help win friends. So better be fresh!

ear whenever her father feels like telling her some of his experiences and the way he has come to feel about many things. It is best to act natural, and friendly, to be patient, and to show faith in the eventual outcome, even though there may be some ups and downs.

Even stay-at-home parents often have difficulty in recognizing that their teen-aged daughters are not the same as they were when younger. And it is easy enough to understand how much harder it may be for a father who has not been eased into changes gradually, to recognize in the young woman he finds on his return the youngster he dreamed about while away. But he can grow to admire the new daughter very much, too—given time, love and encouragement!

AIRING problems usually brings comfort and practical suggestions. Won't you write and tell Alice Barr Grayson what's on your mind? If you sign your complete name and address (they won't be printed), and state your age, a personal reply will be sent you—unless, of course, your problem or one just like yours is answered in this department. Write to Mrs. Grayson, CALLING ALL GIRLS, 52 Vanderbilt Avenue, New York 17, N.Y.

For almost two years I went steady with a boy who was a year ahead of me in school. Now he has gone to the larger high school and has broken off with me. He's very smooth and can date anyone he wants to. I realize that it is hopeless to want him back but since he broke off with me, I've lost confidence in myself.—Anne M., aged 17, Pennsylvania.

WHEN a precious friend is no longer interested in continuing the relationship once mutually enjoyed, it is not easy for the one who wants to go on, in the old, happy way. But this is something that does happen. It is not necessarily because one of the friends is "false" or "untrue" either. It may just be because time and circumstances change. As girls and boys grow older, their interests, feelings, needs, and the new experiences they have, bring about changes. It is important for them to get to know as many young people as they can, in order to understand themselves and others and in preparation for later, more serious "Jack and Jill"-ing.

There is no reason why Anne should feel a loss of confidence. On the contrary, she has proved that it is possible for her to be attractive and popular.

Since Anne really cared for her friend she feels a sense of loss and admits this honestly. We can certainly sympathize with her and understand that it may be quite painful for her to see the boy she likes so much with other girls. Anne is not going to let herself moon endlessly. She wants to get over her temporary "heartache" and she has what it takes. (Girls who've had such problems will testify that, later on, they realized these so-painful earlier experiences helped them to grow up and were valuable stepping stones to much more enduringly satisfying relationships.)

Anne herself will be moving on to the larger school and her own horizon will become broader. She will probably then understand that it wasn't wholly a question of individual choice on Tom's part, but a matter of new group loyalty, of class and school prestige, and running with the crowd.

Anne should continue to cultivate other friends of both sexes. She is fortunate in her looks, her friendliness, her intelligence, her ease in expressing herself and her ability to do things. Time helps, too. Older memories have a tendency to grow dimmer in pretty direct proportion to new, satisfying experiences.

CALL YOUR CLUB TO ORDER

able to get little write-ups in the local paper, and oh, what a proud day it is when your club can clip its first press notice!

It's important for the president to see all, hear all, and treat every member's views with respect. What if Susy-Q is way off the beam and makes a motion to rent the Yacht Club for the Hallowe'en party? And Madam President knows the treasury is flat as a flapjack? Not for her to shout Susy down! She has to be careful not to squelch when she doesn't see eye to eye. It's especially necessary for her to remember this during meetings when everyone wants to speak at once. If the club members become so excited that the president has to call for order, she can do it with good nature—but firmly. Then dignity won't be confused with bossiness or loss of temper.

If the club has an adult leader or adviser, how about giving her a break? She should be consulted before each meeting on the business at hand. A counselor is a busy person. She often has meetings of her own to attend. So it's the president's job to find out whether suggested dates for special events such as club exhibits, new members' teas, all-day hikes, etc., fit in with the leader's plans before they're announced in the meeting. The counselor will appreciate the courtesy. And talking things over with her beforehand will give Madam President more self-confidence when she presents the plan to the group.

Parliamentary procedure can be pretty heavy going at times, but maybe it's just the term that gets us down. Well, no one has to know all of Roberts' Rules of Order to conduct a business meeting. But even in a small club, following the right order of events does help to roll the meeting along at a smoother pace. And here, in brief, is the way to go about it.

1. Call to Order
2. Roll Call
3. Secretary's Report
4. Treasurer's Report
5. Reports of
Committee Chairmen
6. Old Business
7. New Business
8. Program
9. Adjournment

Somebody long ago decided that the secretary's report should come before the treasurer's. And it's only right that following each of these reports the club members should be given a chance to make additions or corrections. Once they've said their say, a definite order is followed. There should always be a motion for accepting the report, a second to this motion and an oral vote by the club.

"NOTHING TO DO"

There's often a lot of to-do about the election of the vice president. But after she's in, that young lady sometimes finds herself left out in the cold. Of course, this isn't really so, because the vice president has to be ready to take the president's place at any time. And that's no small job. Funny thing, though, club presidents seem to have unusually good health. Often they leave their assistants no chance at all to show their talents for pinch hitting.

Don't forget that to an amazingly large extent the job of being vice president is what you make it. Even with a president who's on the job every minute, that vice presidency can be more of an office than you'd think. When your group is asked to send a representative to a tea given by another club, or to a conference, why not send the vice president as your reporting delegate?

In many clubs it's the vice president who serves as membership chairman. In a large group, that job is of the greatest possible importance, and offers plenty to do.

Sometimes the vice president has charge of the program of work. Today this means finding activities which will be fun for the members and at the same time be of some use—and goodness knows, there's plenty of "use" in the work lots of girls' clubs are doing.

Suppose a club decides to take up knitting? Even in a small group there's a wide range of ability. It's up to the program chairman to see that the members' skill is put to its best use. She'll find that the Red Cross needs many types of knitted garments—in war or in peace—and the girl who simply can't slip-stitch can be put at an easier knitting job. Making scrapbooks can be fun and a real help to the veterans' hospitals, and here again, the program chairman has the job of seeing that the project goes through and the books reach their destination. It takes a good chairman to think of things to do, and to see that those oh-so-rosy plans don't just evaporate into the thin air of boredom. So never say the vice president has "nothing to do."

CASH ON HAND

Money, money, money! Can't do without it, even in the purely social club. It's the wherewithal that means you can give parties, plays, benefits, buy those uniforms you've wanted, and give your best when it comes to "causes"—and where's the club that doesn't long to do something really worthwhile in these times?

And so, of course, the treasurer has plenty of work! And why wouldn't she, what with dues to collect, bills to pay, and reports to make? Although this officer really should be picked for her talent at making two plus two equal four, she can't pull money out of a silk hat! Club members can come to her rescue by paying their dues promptly. Besides, it's a good feeling to know that these fees are out of the way.

Speaking of dues, a sure way for the treasurer to make enemies and mix up accounts is for her to forget to give credit to members as they pay. No matter how much bother it is, she needs to stop and record dues on the spot. Even in the small club, membership cards signed by the treasurer do a lot to guard against trouble.

Some clubs have a bank account, but, more often, it's up to the treasurer to keep the cash. She

Are you in the know?

Do this often, if you're addicted to—

- ☐ Tantrums
- ☐ Booming blues
- ☐ Hickey trouble

You can drown all three sorrows (above)—in your daily tub! For a warm bath relaxes; improves the disposition. And a clean, scrubbed skin discourages hickies . . . boosts your date bookings. Don't neglect bathing on problem days when it's more important than ever. To help you stay sweet and dainty, Kotex now contains a deodorant. A deodorant that can't shake out because it is processed right into each Kotex napkin—locked in, not merely dusted on. It's a new Kotex "extra"!

To use silver correctly, would you—

- ☐ Start from the outside
- ☐ Start from the inside
- ☐ Catch as catch can

Fumble for the right fork or spoon? Not if you follow this simple rule: Start from the outside, work in toward your plate. You're fluster-proof when you can skip social errors. And you'll make no mistake on "trying days", when you choose the poise-preserving sanitary napkin . . . Kotex. Truth is, Kotex gives you confidence through comfort. Because Kotex is made to stay soft while wearing . . . so different from pads that just "feel" soft at first touch. There's no roping, no wadding up, with Kotex.

If he stood you up last night—

- ☐ Should you blow your top
- ☐ Be a tearful earful
- ☐ Bide your time

Tears or temper won't teach him. Bide your time 'til he calls again, then give out with the brush-off. Keeping calm wins many a victory . . . over "calendar" jitters, too. With Kotex, see how serenely you can sail through difficult days! For you're sure the flat tapered ends of Kotex don't show. Unlike thick, blunt napkins, those patented flat pressed ends don't cause revealing outlines...and you'll feel secure with the extra protection of Kotex' special safety center!

should find a safe place and see that neither she nor her little brother borrows from the fund.

The treasurer should also insist on a signed receipt whenever she spends the club's money.

When there is a corresponding secretary, she, as you know, takes care of club correspondence. But very often one secretary does the whole thing, writes all club letters as well as the minutes. Important? Rather! The whole club will be judged by what goes out over her name. She'll be wise to get someone to read over these missives before she sends them out. If a word or line is left out by mistake, the result may be startling.

Have you ever been to a meeting at which the reading of the minutes threatened to go on forever? Keeping the records can be streamlined by making up a form that provides spaces for attendance, reports, old business and new business. It's easy to check or to fill in the important information while the meeting's under way. Later the minutes should be written up in paragraph form, with room left for additions or corrections. After the report has been accepted, it should be copied carefully into the secretary's notebook, in ink.

And now, are you ready for the question? A motion has been made and seconded—a motion to make your club a smooth-functioning, lively organization that's fun to belong to! All in favor?

but she couldn't help it; it was out before she knew it.

"I'm the president of it," he said. "And what I say goes."

"Hang on to yourself," Sally thought desperately. "If you let go now, you're lost. He's being—childish. I won't let him see how mad he's making me." She lifted her head and looked at him levelly. "How can you decide whether or not we should have a Teen Club before you have even heard of our reasons?" she demanded.

His face grew redder, his eyes blazed behind the glasses. He pounded the desk with his fist, and his neck swelled visibly under his collar. If he could only see what he looks like, Sally decided with swift scorn. He's making a spectacle of himself with his temper. A sudden thought struck her. Glory! Was that the way she seemed to other people? She blushed with shame at the very thought—it was awful.

"Young lady," he bellowed, "no impertinences! I know why you youngsters want a Teen Club—because some other school has one, and you want to be equal to or ahead of them. Because you want to dance and stay out nights, instead of staying at home studying your lessons. Because you want a place to raise the roof with high jinks, and . . ."

This was too much! Sally leaned across the desk, tense and determined, calling on all her self-control as she had never called on it before. There was such a lot at stake. "Mr. Leveridge, that simply isn't so!" Her voice vibrated, and she could feel the blood pounding in her temples. This was important, and if she exploded now it would be all over. Mr. Leveridge was being ridiculous, but this time she wasn't going to be.

Still leaning across the desk she gave him the whole picture in short, snappy sentences. The trouble they had been having with the Meadville boys and girls who had no place to go for relaxation and pleasure, and the complaints of the overworked police department. She spoke of the success of other clubs, the enthusiasm already shown for them by the Chamber of Commerce and the Y's, and how they had promised to help with the project if the School Board would cooperate on it.

Sally knew her stuff and she gave it to Mr. Leveridge with fire in her eyes and confidence in her voice. This was bigger than herself; this was for Meadville High and, more than that, for Meadville itself. He had to see it—it was up to her to make him see it.

She talked for ten minutes. Every time he mumbled an objection or grunted disbelief she shot back with ready argument.

"If you want to know more, I'll be back tomorrow," she said. "If you want to talk to the others, I'll get them down here. But we've got to have that club, and we'll be around here until we get it."

Sally paused, out of breath. She had done her best, but her words had only made him more furious. He glared at her in an ominous, mounting silence. Suddenly he stood up and made a shooing movement with his hands. "Get out!" he bellowed. "Get out—you've worn me down, can't you see? I've got other work to do."

"When's the next meeting of the Board?" Sally asked.

"Friday night," he replied.

"Then may we begin planning next week?"

"Get out of here!" he shouted. And when she still stood there, he added, "Young lady, I'd advise you to take up law."

She knew she'd won then. She smiled and held out her hand. "Thank you, Mr. Leveridge. That's the nicest compliment I ever had."

She didn't realize how tense she'd been until she was out of the office and down the street. Then she thought her knees would buckle under her. But she'd won. She'd shown the gang. . . . And then she stopped short. She had started out to show the gang, but she had shown herself something, too. It was quite a discovery. She had won because Mr. Leveridge had lost his temper and she had managed to keep hers. A temper was a grand thing to have—if you made it work for you. She'd have to tell Peter.

Suddenly it came to her. Maybe Peter knew that. Maybe that was why he'd forced her into this, so she'd find it out for herself.

"Do you want that apology now—or later?" Peter said, when she told him what had happened.

"I don't want one at all, Peter," she said.

She liked the way he was looking at her. For the first time, she was quite sure she knew how to keep him looking at her this way—from now on.

It's TUNE-IN TIME

ARE you in a dial-daze? After listening every week to the CALLING ALL GIRLS Club of the Air, do you go to sleep at night thinking of fun, fashions, new friends? Do you dream of a certain radio announcer—name of Tom Shirley—of a live-jive-wire called Jenny Jabberwocky, of tips to smooth teens, fascinating guest stars, swooner-crooners, thrilling radio plays, up-to-the-second style news as only Nancy Pepper can dish it out? Ah-ha! You've got it bad, and that's good!

Want to make something of it? Run—walking's too slow—to the nearest CALLING ALL GIRLS Official Headquarters Store that sponsors our weekly radio show, rush took a deep breath. "It was the mischief at the cave that made me decide I had to get those records," he said. "John knew what had happened four years ago, and he worried over Cy, that's why he wrote me about it, I had an idea it would be just as well if you never knew what really happened, so John and I thought we'd work in secret. But today, when Nick could so easily have been killed, I saw that I'd made a mistake. Four years ago the same thing happened to Dr. Fundy, the very same. Only more of it. And one evening, well—there was the accident. A rock fell from up on the mesa, Dr. Fundy jumped out of its way, lost his footing, and..."

No one spoke for a moment. Then Mrs. Fundy said, "You should have told me, Bob."

"I didn't have any proof that it wasn't just an accident. And you took it pretty hard—I thought knowing about the things that had happened wouldn't make it any easier for you. I'd like to have kept it from you now. That's why I suggested to John I'd just sneak down, see if we were right in our suspicions, take what steps we had to, say nothing to anyone, and I'd sneak off again, without anyone being the wiser. But these youngsters had me on the run. Toby recognized me when I did some fancy prowling last night, Rusty was hot on my trail, and it seemed as if they weren't going to let me do a quiet job of sleuthing and then clear out."

"I see. And do you know now who was responsible for Dr. Fundy's death?"

Bob put his hand on the dictaphone cylinders. "I have a pretty good guess. What I'm hoping is that Dr. Fundy knew definitely who was trying to stop his work, and named him on the records."

Since the dictaphone was still in the cabin, and it was too late to drive over for it, they had to be patient. However, the young people surrounded Bob, bombarding him with questions.

"Start at the beginning," Rusty said. "I suppose it was John Revere who wrote you that we were going to drive Mrs. Fundy's car down for her?" Bob nodded. "And then you came to see Aunt Ede thinking that you could have a chance at the car before it left Minneapolis, and when you heard Aunt Ede's story, you decided to kill two birds with one stone—drive us down and get the records sometime when we weren't around—only we were always haunting you!" When Bob agreed, she burst out, "Honestly, I think you were back of the whole thing—even Aunt Ede's having her teeth out!"

"My word, no!" Bob cried. "She didn't mind staying behind, though. And she hinted that if she stayed away, something she's always hoped would happen might happen." He threw a meaningful glance over his shoulder at Dr. Jerrold and Mrs. Fundy, deep in conversation with John Revere.

"I know," said Rusty. "Cy told me. At first I didn't like the idea, but now—I guess we'd be pretty lucky."

"You'd be plenty lucky," Bob assured her. "I don't know that you deserve such good luck after what you did to me. And the way you and Nick treated John when he tried to help us at the two-mile turn last night."

Rusty blushed, and confessed that she had overheard Bob's conversation with John over the telephone, thought Bob meant to have his accomplice kidnap them somewhere at the two-mile turn so Bob could steal the car, and how Nick and she had determined they would not be abducted. "But didn't you feel cheap when the Ark didn't have a thing the matter with it?"

"Like a half nickel," Bob said. "And when I lured you from your room last night and stole the keys..."

"I saw you," Toby broke in. "I recognized you, and even if I didn't know what was going on, I thought I'd back you up. You didn't have that limp four years ago. But I'd read about how you got it, and if we'd known you were coming, we'd have met you with a brass band, which wouldn't have been so good for your plans. Gosh, Bob, the Purple Heart and everything! If Rusty'd read the papers..."

Bob flushed. "All right, so it grounded me. But I can still dig. And if we can get rid of the menace at the cave, and Mrs. Fundy will take me on..." He went on to explain the difficulties of reaching the upper cave, why it had escaped detection, how Dr. Fundy had figured out the tunnel, and how they had dug it.

"And today," Rusty said, "when we chased you through the tunnel, you hid, went back to the cabin, and locked the door, didn't you?" Bob nodded. "But then, did you come back into the cave again? Wearing a sombrero?"

"Certainly not," Bob said. "Never owned a sombrero."

He explained that when he returned to the cabin he found Cy and Muff guarding the car. He'd climbed out a window, and hidden in the brush, hoping to reach the car, if Cy would only leave it. He'd got his chance at last, but Cy had made off with the keys. And after the car was gone, he had sat in the cabin and stared starvation in the face until John, thinking he might be there, had stopped by.

"Someone in a sombrero was in the cave," Rusty insisted, and told of her experience with the shadow. When she saw that Bob looked unconvinced, she added, "Laugh if you want to, but shadows don't grunt! There was someone there."

"Why didn't you look for the records first thing this morning?" Muff wanted to know.

"Well, sugar, I'd been up half the night, and I have to sleep, same as you. Then old Nakwatiwa had to choose today to nose around the cabin, pasturing his old burro on the brush. He hung around for hours. And then you came!"

"I thought at first it was his burro I saw," Rusty said. "But Toby says burros run wild on the mesa. Nakwatiwa saw the ghost of Dr. Fundy's car last night. Do you suppose he really sees ghosts?"

Bob looked at her sharply. "He might have seen me drive to the cabin. But he should have been in bed at that hour." He stood up. "And that's a good place for all of us right now."

The next day while the girls tried to amuse Nick, the boys and Bob went to the cabin for the dictaphone. They were gone so long that Rusty was sure they were exploring the upper cave. When they returned, they brought the dictaphone up to Nick's room, and reported that the Ark was still visible and could be rescued.

Bob announced, "Cy had a corking idea, and we've rigged up a kind of loud-speaker arrangement. If it works, we can all hear the records."

And presently, after the boys had tinkered with the dictaphone a bit, they heard a man's voice say clearly, "I learned the site of the buried Indian village from Nakwatiwa, the Hopi chieftain."

MARINES use the famous "Water Buffalos" in storming island beachheads. Plowing shoreward, these amphibious tractors sometimes go completely under the water but their speedy pumps bail them out. This "ducking" often put the communications equipment out of action at the moment it was needed most.

So Bell Telephone Laboratories' scientists worked out a headset and lip microphone that water can't hurt yet lets the wearer hear and talk even through the noise of battle.

Manufactured by the Western Electric Company, organization of supply for the Bell System, it weighs less than 20 ounces and can be unplugged quickly in an emergency. This is another example of the many ways Bell System research and manufacturing are helping our armed forces.

terms, found much of the account hard to understand. Mrs. Fundy and Bob listened intently. Cy, crouched beside the machine, followed every word. But what Rusty did understand, as record followed record, were the frequent references, often amusing, to the mischief that plagued the professor. The theft of his spades. The appearance of a ghost one night when he had worked unusually late. The Indian symbol. The fire in the cave. The covering up of the dig with the dirt he had sifted. The rope that had been stretched across the passage, over which he had tripped. She grew more and more excited.

"Isn't he going to discover who did it?" she asked, when there was only one record left to hear.

Bob looked anxious. "If it isn't on 'this one,' he said, 'we're right back where we started.'"

The first part of the remaining record gave a detailed report of Dr. Fundy's findings that day at the dig. Then, "Today Nakwatiwa rode over on his burro to warn me that the cave is full of evil spirits," the professor's voice said. "I have long suspected that the old fellow is the author of all the mischief that has delayed my work. But when I taxed him with it, I could get nowhere. When he doesn't want to understand, Nakwatiwa can be very dense. But I warned him that neither evil spirits nor mischief-making humans would stand in the way of my explorations. He went away muttering. I hope we shall have peace now."

"That's all," said Cy.

"Nakwatiwa!" Mrs. Fundy said. "But I don't understand! He told Dr. Fundy about the cave in the first place. Why would he try to stop him from digging?"

"He's afraid of the spirits of his ancestors," Bob said. "They visit him periodically, John Revere tells me. They may have objected to being dug up." He rose. "Well, we still have no proof."

Nick had been silent while they listened to the records. Now he sat up suddenly and said, "What would you do if you had proof?"

"Don't know, Nicko. He's pretty old."

"He's old," said Mrs. Fundy, "and superstitious. Why, Nick? Could you tell us something?"

"Not if it means the old fellow goes to jail," said Nick stubbornly.

"All right, it needn't go that far. What we want is to prevent him from doing any more mischief, so that we can dig."

Nick thought a moment. "I saw Nakwatiwa up on the rocks. He acted as if he was sore about something—waved his sombrero and shook his fist in the air, and—maybe he didn't see me, but he pushed the rock over. I guess I was so surprised, I just lay there and let it hit me."

Bob looked grim. "There's your chap with the sombrero; Rusty. And Nick, maybe he did see you—and mistook you for Cy. He didn't want Cy digging in the lower cave for fear he'd discover the upper one. Another thing, John tells me Masi has been helping you, Cy. That must have been pretty hard for his grandfather to take, except that he knew you weren't in the right cave—yet."

"Masi recognized the Indian sign right away, and tore off for home," Cy said. "If he guessed it was his grandfather's work he must have been pretty sore. I wish there were some way to stop Nakwatiwa's pranks, that's all!"

"I have it!" cried Rusty.

"What?"

"A way to cure Nakwatiwa. Only don't ask me now. I have to find out first if it will work."

All afternoon, while the boys were away superintending the rescue of the Ark, Rusty acted very strangely, slipping away to visit John Revere, shutting herself up in the library with paper and pencil. Her eyes sparkled mischievously. That night after dinner, she cornered Bob. "Will you drive us to the Hopi village where Masi lives?"

"Yes, if you'll tell me what you're up to."

"I can't, Bob. I promised not to. John Revere is going with us."

All the way across the mesa, Rusty sat nervous and tense on the edge of the seat, a mysterious bundle on her lap, taking no part in what the boys were saying. John Revere was equally silent.

As they approached the Indian village, and saw the fires burning here and there, Bob said, "Seems to be a festival going on."

"There is," said John. "Stop here, Bob. You'll have to wait a while for me. All right, Rusty."

"Here's the bundle, Mr. Revere," Rusty said. "And you won't forget, will you?"

"I know it by heart," John Revere laughed. "In English. Now to change it into Hopi." And taking the bundle, he disappeared into the dark.

"Going to tell us now, Rusty?" Bob asked.

Rusty laughed. "Wait till John Revere comes back. If it doesn't work, he doesn't want to be laughed at."

They waited a long time. At last they heard footsteps approaching. John had Masi with him.

"Did it work?" Rusty asked breathlessly.

"I'm afraid it was too successful," John said.

Masi chuckled. "Tonight in the kiwa my grandfather was visited by the ghost of one of his ancestors. The spirit spoke to Nakwatiwa in tones that burned like fire!"

"Good!" cried Rusty. "Did you remember to put a lot of punch into that last line—about staying away from the cave forevermore?"

John Revere laughed. "Rusty, I have a confession to make. The stirring speech which you spent all afternoon writing, and I spent all evening memorizing and changing into Hopi—when I was masked and dressed in my ceremonial costume, and Masi smuggled me into the kiwa, what do you suppose happened?"

"You forgot every word of it!" cried Rusty.

"Exactly! So then—I made one up. And old Nakwatiwa is now convinced that not only must he never harm anyone again, but he is trembling with eagerness to atone for his sins. He means to spend his remaining years in helping Cy dig!"

With a groan, Rusty collapsed into the back seat.

The next morning they gathered in Nick's room to report their success while he ate his breakfast. Crink sat on the bed, hopefully watching each piece of toast and waiting for his share.

"You know he shouldn't be on the bed, Nick," Rusty said. "Your mother wouldn't like it, would she, Toby?"

"Mrs. Fundy fixed it with Toby's mother," Nick protested. "Mrs. Fundy said if a guy was going to be laid up for six weeks, he at least ought to have his dog on the bed, not under it."

Bob grinned. "Well, that makes her solid with Nick," he said. "Cy? What about you?"

Cy laughed. "Me? She's going to let me dig, isn't she?"

"Solid again!" Bob's eyes twinkled. "Rusty?"

"I think you're horrid, Bob Crombie!" Rusty said, laughing. "As if dogs and digs could influence my vote! I'm going to go find Pops and Mrs. Fundy and give them both my blessing."

COOKIE MAKES PUDDINGS PLUS

ONE sponge dessert leads to another. Everybody likes them, and once you catch the main idea they can be varied by changing the flavoring and maybe tickling up the proportions a little.

Obviously, the eggs are the fluff-uppers, the gelatin holds the whole business together, and beyond that you have only liquid and flavoring to add. Here are a couple of dandy possibilities, bound to please the family.

PINEAPPLE SPONGE PUDDING

Start out just like the basic recipe, soaking your tablespoon of gelatin in $\frac{1}{4}$ cup of cold water, adding an equal quantity of hot. Stir in $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar, $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon of salt and 1 teaspoon of lemon juice (it adds a zip to all fruit flavors). Then add 1 cup of crushed canned pineapple. (Raw fresh pineapple unjells your jello, so if you are using fresh, boil for 5 minutes with the sugar and enough water to cover, before you put it in.) Cool, beat, and add 2 beaten egg whites, folding them lightly into the mixture. Mold and chill. Serves about six.

APRICOT SPONGE PUDDING

Especially good in winter when fresh fruits are scarce. Soak $\frac{1}{2}$ pound of dried apricots overnight in 2 cups of cold water. Bring slowly to a boil and continue to cook slowly till tender. Save the juice to use instead of water and crush the fruit to a smooth pulp. (One good way is to use a potato ricer, or the device that purees the baby's vegetables). Up the gelatin to $1\frac{1}{2}$ tablespoons, and soften it in $\frac{1}{2}$ cup of the apricot juice. Boil another $\frac{1}{2}$ cup of juice with $1\frac{1}{4}$ cups of sugar, and use this to dissolve the gelatin. You can spike the flavor with 2 or 3 tablespoons of lemon juice. Add the mashed pulp, cool, and add 4 beaten egg whites and a pinch of salt. Mold and chill. Enough for about eight.

consideration at home often prevents a lot of the jangling that mars many a fireside scene. Anyway, consideration and thoughtfulness are really coming to those you are fond of.

That doesn't mean you can't relax at home. Surely you can relax politely! But check some of these items and see if there isn't room for improvement in your etiquette routine:

1. Do you get up when an older member of your family enters the room? You don't have to bob up and down like a jack-in-the-box, but when Mother comes into the living room, let us say, looking as if she had hoped there'd be an available chair, do you offer her yours? She'll appreciate it.

2. If you want to talk with some member of the family, do you just yell for him, or do you go around quietly and look for him before sounding forth?

3. Do you lend an interested ear to the words of your family, or do you act bored? Learning to be a good listener takes practice, and home is a wonderful training ground. Also, making a habit of being politely attentive to your family pays good dividends when you yourself want an audience.

4. How about the table manners? Do you gobble and grab in the privacy of your family, or do you wait politely and ask for things to be passed and generally help make the meals pleasant?

5. Are you rude and demanding in your requests for services from your family or do you ask if they can conveniently help you?

6. When someone asks you to do an errand, do you whine and act imposed upon or do you crash through graciously?

7. If someone drops something or needs a door opened, do you turn blind, or do you rise to the occasion? You'll also get—and rate—a few extra breaks for this, because families do notice, even if they don't talk about it.

8. Do you remember that the members of your family have their rights, like privacy of phone conversations and own rooms?

Enough listing, but you get the idea. The moral of all this is: good manners begin at home, and it's the wise gal who gives them good roots in the home soil.

TRICKS for TEENS

Sweater Spotlight—Ready to tub those sweaters? Then you may want to try this timesaver. After washing them in mild soap, shape the sweaters on tissue paper on an old window screen laid across two chairs. The air circulating beneath the sweaters will make them dry more quickly.—Lyn Ketterson, Atlanta, Ga.

Global News—You're thinking about world affairs these days, and what could be smarter than covering that slightly dog-eared notebook with a map of the world?—Jean Commorato, New York, N. Y. Here's a way you can have an address book on your bedroom wall. Pin a large map on the wall. Then fasten one end of a thin ribbon to the town or area where each of your friends is living or stationed. The other end of the ribbon is pinned to a card outside the map and gives the name and address of each friend.—Clare Kropeln, Buffalo, N. Y.

Jive Socks—With cold weather coming, a woolly idea for trimming your sweat socks or skating socks is to take scraps of wool material and make bright cuffs for your socks. You can sew snaps to the wool band and snap them to your cuffs.—Kathryn Owen, Berwyn, Ill. If it's long stockings for you, try this new system in your stocking box. In each section put a slip describing the present condition of the stockings in that section—mended toe, one darned run, perfect sheers, etc. Saves time in that last minute rush or when a pair of hose unexpectedly develops a run.—Lucille M. Mount, Englishtown, N. J.

Pin-Ups

From a large-sized blotter you can cut out a bulletin board in the shape of an easel or silhouette of your swoon man to pin on the wall. Then you'll have a place for those photographs, cartoons, and clippings.—Barbara Revell, Brookings, S. D. If it's knickknack space you need, try transforming a cigar box into a small shelf. Two shelves can be made from the lid of the box. They will fit in the box crosswise and may be held up with short nails. Next, paint the box a color that harmonizes with your room, and then gather a strip of bright ribbon about two inches wide and tack this around the edge of your new shelf.—Anne Keays, Carleton Place, Ont.

period. So their whole attitude toward it, if not outright rebellious and unhappy, was pretty negative. No wonder they called it the curse!

Did we say it was a hush-hush matter Way Back Then? Well, it was, but when it was whispered about, there were some pretty queer notions that used to circulate! One was that the menstrual discharge of blood was bad or impure, and that when a girl had her period, she should stay away from other people for fear of contaminating them! The fact is that the menstrual flow is entirely healthy and normal. Some of you may have heard of girls who didn't know about menstruation before it happened to them, and who, when they first saw the menstrual blood, were frightened and thought they had injured themselves. One girl, when her first period began, was slapped sharply on the cheek by an aunt, with the best of intentions, of course. The slap was supposed to give her red cheeks for the rest of her life! Other girls have had similar experiences. Remember, such beliefs were customary in the past, though they didn't have any scientific basis. Luckily, we no longer depend on whispering campaigns and old superstitions.

All healthy girls menstruate. They usually begin when they are about thirteen years old, but any time between eleven and fifteen is normal. The first sign is some spotting of blood which has come out of the vaginal opening. The show of blood usually lasts four to five days, but this also may vary. Some girls flow only three days, others as long as seven. Soft absorbent pads are worn and are changed frequently until the period is over. Although it may be irregular the first few times, menstruation reappears at regular intervals once it gets established, with most girls beginning on about every twenty-eighth day. (That doesn't mean exact, clocklike regularity, though. A day or two early—or late—is nothing to worry about.) Other girls have a regular cycle which may be as short as every twenty-one days, and with still others there may be as much as a thirty-two day interval between the beginnings of the periods. It's useful to jot down your menstruation date on your calendar, to be taken into account when planning activities.

Although as a rule there's no discomfort associated with the period, some girls find that they tire a little more easily than, and perhaps feel somewhat more tense than usual. That's why most high school and college physical education departments have rules to keep girls from playing competitive games—that is, against other school teams—during the first few days of menstruation. But the old regulation which excused girls from taking gymnasium work during their periods is definitely out in most schools. So today you report for gym, take some modified exercise, as well as a warm soap and water shower, if possible, and feel the better for it.

Those so-called cramps? Don't hesitate to go and see your doctor if you have frequent menstrual pains or cramps—or if you're anxious about anything that has to do with menstruation. There may be something that needs correction—or if everything's fine, it's wonderful to have your worries set at rest!

But sometimes when you do have discomfort at your period, it can be the result of gas pains, associated with constipation. And here's something you can do about that. Drink a lot of water, eight to ten glasses a day. Eat generously of fruit and vegetables. You'll find it helps. Girls who are in good physical condition, who exercise regularly for fun, who get plenty of sleep and regular meals, don't have menstrual discomfort compared to girls who keep late hours, sit around a lot, or are anxious and upset about themselves.

Taking warm baths during menstruation time is not only perfectly safe, but it's also very wise. You perspire more at this time, and that means more tubbing in order to keep clean and fresh. Cold water in itself isn't harmful, if you feel like bathing in it, but the important thing is to avoid chilling yourself. Of course, you'll no doubt stay out of the water at public beaches for aesthetic reasons, and stick to sunning yourself on those days. But there's no reason why you shouldn't play tennis or go dancing, just so you don't overdo.

Some of you may be curious to know not only what menstruation is, but why it takes place. You see, the actual menstrual flow itself.

lasting four or five days, is only one phase of the menstrual cycle which takes about twenty-eight days to complete. The whole cycle is closely related to the activity of the reproductive organs. These are the organs through which new life is generated, and through which women have the ability to become mothers.

The reproductive organs consist of the ovaries, two tubes known as the Fallopian tubes, the uterus, and the vagina. The lower part, or the neck, as it's called, of the uterus (a pear-shaped body, about three inches long and placed in the lower part of the abdominal cavity) projects into the vaginal passage. The Fallopian tubes are attached to each side of the upper end of the uterus and connect the uterus with the ovaries. The ovaries are two almond-sized glands low down on either side of the abdominal cavity, and have two important functions. It's the glandular secretions of the ovaries that help you grow into a woman. They also produce the tiny egg cells which are the starting point for the mother's portion of the life of a new child.

When you're old enough to menstruate, the cells in the ovaries begin to mature and once in approximately every twenty-eight days one of these tiny egg cells passes down from the ovary, through one of the Fallopian tubes, and into the uterus. At about the time the egg cell leaves the ovary, an additional supply of blood is sent to the uterus to grow a receptive lining. If this lining isn't needed for nourishing a fertilized egg until it grows into a baby, it is loosened and passes out of the body as the menstrual flow or menstrual period. That's the usual sequence of events.

That's a very condensed account of what you can see is a very intricate subject. If you study college biology or physiology, or if your high school courses cover the subject, you'll go into it more fully.

Once you know what menstruation is for and how it works, it's not so mysterious, is it? And it's certainly nothing to worry over or to feel self-conscious about either. If you follow the rules, you can live a normal life and have plenty of fun without giving this perfectly natural process more than a second thought!

RECORD RATERS

WELL, look, who's leading the parade! It's "Bell Bottom Trousers"! That's the platter-of-the-month for our Washington, D. C., Record Raters. And they'll take it five different ways—à la Dorsey (Tommy for Victor, Jimmy for Decca) or as recorded by Tony Pastor (Victor), Harry James (Columbia), or Guy Lombardo (Decca). They're all favorites.

For second place they're partial to the little number called "On the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe," either Paul Weston's Capitol recording with Johnny Mercer et al, or John S. Trotter's band and Bing's singing as Decca records it. Arriving on Track 2!

Yep, they're hep! Testing top tunes in the record department of The Hecht Company, Official Headquarters Store in Washington, D. C., are, left to right: Calling All Girls Club Members Evelyn Draper, 13, with Wynn Kai; Carol Rau, 17; Ginger Blankenship, 14, Washington winner of the Calling All Girls Movie Contest; Peggy Keys, 18, who was the winner of our Fashion Quiz Contest in her city; Kathryn Mylroie, 16; and Phil Friedlander.

Their all-time favorite? The "Polonaise," no less! Iturbi's Victor recording preferred, with C. Cavellaro's Decca disk a close second. Almost as popular is "After Hours," the Bluebird recording by Erskine Hawkins and his band. That's lead-off listening for down on the old lady's head. "Want me to put that up for you?" a pleasant voice asked, and Jenny turned to meet the intelligent, amused glance of a boy a year or two older than herself. Behind him, across the aisle, was an empty seat that must be his.

"Oh, yes, thank you," Jenny smiled warmly. And then, remembering Aunt Dora's stern warning, she said, "I mean—yes, if you will, please," in a chill polite tone.

He lifted the heavy bag as if it had been filled with feathers, stowed it away, and then stepped back. "Anything else?"

"No, thank you."

"I'll lift it down for you when you get out," he said cheerfully. His blue eyes were bright and his tow-colored hair was combed flat. Jenny couldn't help wondering if the green hat pulled down over her own brown curls was really as becoming as it had seemed in the shop. "Going all the way to New York?" he added.

"Yes," Jenny sat down primly and looked straight ahead.

He sat down, too, in his own seat, and opened his book. "Guide to New York," he grinned across at her. "I've got quite a stop-over before I have to catch the train to school, and I've got my itinerary all figured out. And believe me, I'm going to really see the town."

Jenny cast him one envious glance and then looked straight ahead again. Boys always were luckier than girls, she thought.

And sometimes, she added irrelevantly, they were terribly attractive, too. But she put that idea firmly out of her mind and looked out the window. She might as well try to enjoy the scenery, at least.

"Do you live in New York, dear?" the old lady inquired in a gentle voice, and when Jenny turned to glance at her, she added with a shy smile, "I couldn't help overhearing you say you were going there."

"I'm just going through," Jenny told her. And then, because she looked so sympathetic, Jenny went on to explain about the odious necessity of sitting in Grand Central Station for five whole hours until the train for Duxberry left.

"Oh, what a shame! Of course, I understand how your aunt feels—and I know how you do, too—but it is too bad there isn't some grownup in town your family could trust to take you around and show you things." The old lady lifted a black-gloved hand, which had been clutching the parcel in her lap, and patted Jenny's arm. "I just wish I could take you sight-seeing—if only I didn't have so many errands to do today. And I'm going to be in town only a few hours myself. But I do know New York—my goodness, yes. I used to live there."

And in her quiet voice she began to tell Jenny fascinating stories of the city years ago, when hansom cabs rolled up and down Fifth Avenue and the Woolworth Building was New York's proudest skyscraper. Jenny listened, enchanted. It was almost as good as seeing a movie, she thought. It just proved what she'd reminded herself about people looking interesting.

Occasionally she glanced out of the corner of her eye at the boy across the aisle, and she could see that he was listening, too. Somehow that made the stories even better. Once or twice their eyes met and he grinned at her companionably; she couldn't help smiling slightly in return, but she always turned her attention back immediately to Mrs. McGee.

"Granny Mac, the youngsters in the family call me," the old lady had confided. "So your name is Jenny, dear. What a pretty old-fashioned sound it has."

When they were nearing New York, Mrs. McGee looked uncomfortable for a moment and then she said, "My dear child, I wonder if I could ask you to do me a favor?"

"I'd like to, if I can," Jenny replied.

"Well, I was wondering—now mind you, you must just tell me if this is too much trouble—but I was wondering if you'd mind keeping my parcel for me for an hour or so? I have so many things to attend to, and you did say you were going to be sitting right in the station. I thought perhaps you could just tuck it into your bag, and perhaps it wouldn't be too much of a burden. You were going to check your bag, I suppose?"

"Why, yes, I guess so." Aunt Dora had said she'd better, so if she went to get something to eat she wouldn't have to be bothered with it. "I'd be glad to take it, Mrs. McGee, if you think we'd be able to find each other later on."

"Of course we would, dear. Why, I couldn't miss that pretty green hat and coat of yours. You see," she ran on, "it's a present for my daughter who's getting married soon—a rather valuable old piece of the family silver. And I just know that if I carried it around with me I'd be sure to leave it somewhere. Of course I could check it myself, but since you're going straight to Grand Central Station, and I have to go there myself later—but perhaps I shouldn't trouble you."

"Oh, no. It wouldn't be any trouble at all, really. I'd be awfully glad to take care of it for you. Only—suppose I lost it somehow?"

"Nonsense, child. I know you wouldn't do that. I can see just by looking at you what a trustworthy person you are. Shall we put it in your bag, then?"

"All right."

Jenny wasn't too happy about the arrangement. She'd always hated borrowing things from people, because she was so afraid she might lose or break something that didn't belong to her. But this wasn't borrowing, exactly. And anyhow, she couldn't refuse. The old lady had been so kind, entertaining her during the whole trip.

Jenny glanced up toward her bag, and an instant later the boy across the aisle was on his feet. "Want that down now? We're nearly in."

"Why, yes, if you don't mind." She stood up. "Would you put it there on the seat, please? I want to open it."

"Sure thing."

Together she and Mrs. McGee crowded the parcel in. It was fairly heavy, but fortunately not very large. Jenny wondered what kind of silver would have that flat, oblong shape. But she hated to seem curious, so she didn't ask.

"There." Mrs. McGee snapped the last catch fast. "I do hope it won't make your bag too heavy for you. You mustn't worry about my finding you. I'll just look around in the main waiting room and in the lunchrooms until I see you, that's all. You don't know what a worry you've taken off my mind, child."

"Oh, that's all right. It's nothing, really."

And then suddenly the train, which had been running through a black tunnel for some moments—it was the tunnel that ran under the Hudson River, the old lady had said—emerged briefly into semi-lightness and then pulled slowly to a stop.

"I'm in New York," Jenny thought excitedly. And, motioning Mrs. McGee ahead of her, she stepped out into the crowded aisle where passengers were waiting impatiently one behind the other.

The boy across the way grinned at her, as he swung down his own bag. Jenny smiled back trying not to let him see that she had noticed the neat letters that said BOB CRANACH.

"Well, here goes," he said. "I hope I get around to all the things on my list."

"Good luck." It was all right to be polite to somebody you weren't going to see again, she told herself. It wasn't as if she had encouraged a conversation at the beginning of the trip.

And then the conductor was helping her down from the car, and she was moving forward with the crowd toward a long flight of steps. Porters rushed past with laden hand trucks, and everybody seemed in a hurry.

"It's exciting to be here, even if I'm not going to see anything," Jenny thought.

At the top of the steps the crowd suddenly dispersed, some of it going one way and some another. Jenny looked around to say a last word to Mrs. McGee, but they must have become separated more widely than she realized. The old lady wasn't in sight. Neither was Bob Cranach—though of course she hadn't really been looking for him, Jenny reminded herself.

She took a deep breath. Well, the first part of the journey was over, and it had been very interesting, really. Now she had to find a cab.

Almost immediately she saw a lighted sign directing her toward the taxicab stand, and after some moments of walking along an underground corridor and up a flight of steps, she found herself in the large central room of the station. It was tremendous, and Jenny stood still a moment watching the hundreds of people hastening to and from the ticket windows, and crowding about the great circular information desk in the center. Then she turned toward the outer door, and a moment later a man in a blue cap handed her into a taxi.

"Grand Central Station," Jenny said, in a blasé manner, and tried to settle back on the leather seat as the car rolled away, one in a long line of similar yellow-painted cabs filled with passengers.

But she gave up trying to seem bored the moment they emerged from the long covered driveway into the sunshine. Why, the sidewalks were as crowded as the station had been!

"Is something special going on today?" Jenny asked, leaning forward a little so the driver could hear her.

"Something special?"
"Everybody's outside. I mean—there are so many people."

The driver laughed. "That's nothing special. That's just New York, miss. It's always like this. Great town. Millions of people. Never been here before?"

"No," Jenny breathed, staring. The streets at home looked like this on Saturday nights, she was thinking, but this was a Wednesday afternoon.

"This here's Seventh Avenue, the heart of the garment manufacturing business," the driver informed her cheerfully. He stopped for a red light, and swung right. "And that's the Metropolitan Opera House."

Jenny gazed back at it reverently! It was a grimy red brick building, but the gay blue and white announcements clustering around the marquee shouted glamorous words at her. Aida. Pons. Il Trovatore.

"And this is Fifth Avenue, Shopping center of the world," the driver said a moment later. Jenny eyed gay shop fronts, and the chic mannequins in their lovely clothes seemed to smile back an invitation to her to pause.

"Public Library to your left." Jenny told herself she would have known it anywhere. The complacent stone lions on either side of the long flight of steps looked just as they did on the postcard pictures she'd seen.

But they disappeared too quickly as the car swung right again, and Jenny just had time to notice a street sign reading 44TH STREET as the cab swung right and then left to enter another covered drive somewhat like the one at Pennsylvania Station.

"Here you are, miss." Was it over so soon? Was that all she was going to see of New York? Now that she'd had a glimpse of it, it was harder than ever to obey Aunt Dora's commands. Sadly she paid the driver and thanked a porter who offered to take her bag. "I can manage," Jenny said, pushing open the swinging door. And then she thought, "This station's even better!" and stood still an instant under the spell of the great room with its domed blue roof twinkling with lights that looked like stars and that were actually arranged in heavenly constellations.

Five minutes later, when she had checked her bag and stowed the stub carefully in her purse, she spent a long time staring up at the beautiful ceiling until her neck ached. Then she walked three times slowly around the big room, and finally she bought a magazine and went into the adjoining waiting room to sit down with it. But she noticed an exit leading to 42nd Street and she had to stand near it for a while and watch the hurrying traffic outside; and then when she finally sat down she found herself so engrossed in watching the other people on the benches that she forgot to read. Who were they all, where did they come from, and what were they doing here?

That woman with the two little girls, for instance. Dressed just alike, but not quite twins—or had one grown faster than the other? It was an exciting game, trying to figure them out. Jenny was completely absorbed in making up a life story to go with a young one-armed soldier talking earnestly with a handsome older man, who looked just like the young one except for his white hair, when a crisp masculine voice broke into her thoughts.

"You're Jenny Whitman, aren't you?" it said. "Mrs. McGee thought I'd find you here. I've come for her parcel."

Jenny looked up at him in confusion. "Why—yes, I am. But I thought she was coming for it herself. I mean . . ."

"She was. But she got held up. Wasn't feeling very well, as a matter of fact, and asked me to get it for her. So you wouldn't worry, see, when she didn't turn up. All right?" His smile was brilliant, but there was something about it Jenny didn't like. And she didn't like the cold look in his black eyes either.

"I don't know," she said slowly. "Mrs. McGee said . . ."

"Look, sister. Give me the package, will you? I'm in a hurry."

And now the black eyes narrowed, and the thin mouth had closed in a tight line. And suddenly Jenny—Jenny Whitman, who had never felt real fear in her whole life—knew that for some reason she was terrified. She was alone in New York and she was frightened to death.
